Need for Help Still Very Great

We spent last month $29,382.50 for the necessities of life given to 5,533 families.

We have in our care today 5,132 families. These can't help themselves just now because of unemployment, sickness, or some other misfortune.

The needy are not now suffering from the cold. There, however, is just as great a demand for food and other necessities as during January.

Won't you help?

NEW YORK ASSOCIATION FOR IMPROVING THE CONDITION OF THE POOR,

SUFFRAGE LUNCHEON WINS $50,000 FUND

Quick Response by 1,400 Guests to Plea of Mrs. Chapman Catt for Money for Campaign.

$6,303 FROM A BALL GAME

New York Schoolteachers Make a Mass Contribution of $2,000, with a Promise of More.

At the biggest suffrage luncheon ever given, 1,400 men and women, who gathered as guests of the Empire State Campaign Committee yesterday afternoon in the Grand Ballroom of the Hotel Astor, contributed $50,000 for the campaign for woman suffrage. Governor Whitman, who had promised to attend if possible, was unable to be present, but Mrs. Whitman was present, and was introduced as the "First Lady of the State." Borough President Marks and Commissioners Fetherston and Moskowitz were among those in attendance.

Mrs. Chapman Catt, Chairman of the committee, presided. Dr. Anna Shaw made an address. Granville Barker and Collector of the Port Dudley Field Malone also spoke. Mrs. Margaret Chanler Aldrich assisted Mrs. Catt, and Miss Mary Garrett Hay, head of the Woman Suffrage Party, in soliciting contributions. Mrs. Raymond Brown, President of the New York State Woman Suffrage Association, occupied a place of honor at the guest table.

Every seat in the big ballroom was taken, and the crowds were so great that it was with difficulty the throng was guided through the big corridors into the ballroom.

The ballroom was simply decorated with an immense American flag over the speakers' table, and opposite was the Empire Campaign Committee banner, bearing the words "Vote Yes, Nov. 2." Flowers were furnished from the conservatories of members of the committee. A big bouquet of the "Mrs. Whitman" carnations, of a deep rose pink, was presented to the wife of the Governor. They were of the color first adopted by the anti-suffragists.

"It does not matter," said Mrs. Catt as she held them aloft. "Mrs. Whitman is not in sympathy with the color."

Tribute to the President.

The entire company rose to its feet out of respect to President Wilson when, in the course of his remarks, Mr. Malone referred to the war and the Lusitania disaster, which has brought it home to so many New York people, and said it was a time for patriots to stand by the head of the Government.

"This is no time for free speech," he said, "even from a man who has been President of the United States. It is a time, as the politicians say, to keep silence in seven languages."

It was after the addresses of Mr. Barker and Dr. Shaw that Mrs. Catt told the guests she had come to the luncheon to raise $35,000.

"You think we cannot do it," she said, "but you will see that it is quite as simple a matter as it was to get the $105,000 which we raised at a mass meeting last November."

Calls were made for pledges, and women suffragists from the different districts into which the State has been divided by the campaign workers announced the money to be contributed from their divisions. This was to bring the amount raised by the suffragists, with the $105,000 of last Fall, up to $140,000 before May 15, which will win a conditional pledge of $10,000.

"There were never so many people giving their services for any cause," said Mrs. Catt. "We have 2,000 women working without pay. We need money for railroad fares and for printers' ink. They ask us if we are going to buy votes. We need 900,000 votes, and with $150,000 we could pay 24 cents a vote.

Ball Game Produces $6,300.

"We are canvassing the entire State, and there is not a town in New York where we have been that there has not been a majority for suffrage. In one town all the people but six were for the women. If we have a clean vote we shall win next November."

Generous contributions began to come in. Albany, the district from which Mrs. Whitman comes, had $2,100 to offer; Miss Harriet May Mills, formerly State President, sent $3,000 from her district; Rochester gave $1,000, Buffalo $3,000, and there was applause when Westchester gave $6,600. The amounts from up-State totaled $20,290. Returns from the city were in equally generous sums, and there was applause when the women teachers made a large contribution for the first time in the history of the movement. They gave $2,000 and also offered workers. Miss Grace Strachan rose to tell the number of teachers from different districts who could be depended upon to work for suffrage.

"There are 7,892," said Miss Strachan, "and one-third of the schools have not been heard from."

The biggest single sum from the city came from the baseball workers, who are to have a share in the proceeds in a big game at the Polo Grounds May 18, for which they are selling tickets. Mrs. Norman de R. Whitehouse announced $6,303 from that source.

"Don't hesitate," said Mrs. Catt. "It is a privilege to aid in turning this page of American history."

Contributions of $50 from different public schools came in, and those who had been keeping account announced the returns, $42,000, $7,000 more than had been asked.

Final Pledges for $3,700.

"That is good," said Mrs. Catt, "but we need more money."

James Lees Laidlaw of the Men's League for Woman Suffrage, offered $1,000 for that organization. A member of a group of colored women arose and offered $10, "with expectations of giving more." A woman in the balcony promised $5. Other contributions came as Mrs. Catt smilingly told the big gathering it was positively having its last chance. The total was announced as $46,278.

"Three cheers for Mrs. Catt!" called a voice in the audience, and they were given with a will, to an accompaniment of waving handkerchiefs.

"How much would it take to raise that amount to $50,000?" asked a voice from the balcony.

"Just $3,722," was the answer after some calculation.

"I think the New York teachers would be safe in promising one-third of that sum," said the voice, amid the enthusiastic demonstrations of the audience. James Lees Laidlaw promised to raise another third, and Mrs. Catt the final third.

There was more applause when Mr. Malone in opening his remarks began with "Fellow citizens." Mr. Malone said he had been converted to suffrage seven years before while sitting beside Dr. Shaw at a dinner. Some one had recommended that the suffrage leader attempt his conversion.

"I am too good a suffragist to try and convert any man to anything before he has had his dinner," returned Dr. Shaw.

"I was converted then and there," said Mr. Malone, "by this exhibition of good sense and insight into human nature. Dr. Shaw did not mention suffrage once to me during the dinner."

Mr. Malone said the women at the luncheon had given him a liberal education in practical politics in their methods of raising money.

Plea by Dr. Shaw.

Mrs. Catt introduced the National Woman Suffrage President as the "woman who has made more suffrage converts than any other one person—Dr. 'Demosthenes' Shaw."

"There was never a class of people so well fitted for the ballot as the women," said Dr. Shaw. "I wish removed from [illegible] the curse of [illegible] domination, the brand of [illegible]. There may be many difficulties, and we may make mistakes, but I would rather be free to do wrong than to be compelled to do right. This is our hour. It is a time when women should forget everything except the second day of November. It is infintely greater than the Fourth of July. That freed a sex. Emancipation Day freed a race. Nov. 2 will free humanity. Keep your eyes on the goal. Congress meets in December, but our time comes in November, and no one who is not feeble in intellect will be led away."

Dr. Shaw referred to the women who, many suffragists believe, are confusing issues by turning their attention to the Federal suffrage amendment.

"Even if we should not succeed in New York," she said, "we shall have made a great gain for the next time, but there will be no next time. Don't let them say that the dear tender hearts of women should be thinking of peace or of charity. The vote will do more to do away with the need of charity than any other factor.

No New Heaven in Sight.

"If these were to be my last words I should say keep your eyes on the second day of November and your thoughts on every man, with no other word in your mind but yes."

"I hope you will not think there will be a new heaven and a new earth when women get the vote," said Granville Barker. "There will not be much change for a time. When the women voters get into the stride I think they will surprise you. I do not think they will show much sentimentality. I think they will be rather ruthless."

As the crowd poured out through the corridors the members of the Baseball Committee were on hand with tickets for the game and found many purchasers.

Many prominent people attended the luncheon, including the members of the luncheon committee, on which were: Mrs. W. Bourke Cockran, Mrs. Victor Sorchan, Mrs. Willard D. Straight, Mrs. Charles L. Tiffany, Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., Miss Lillian D. Wald, Mrs. Egerton L. Winthrop, Jr., Mrs. Seymour L. Cromwell, Mrs. Howard Mansfield, Mrs. F. Louis Slade, Mrs. John Blair, and Miss Clara B. Spence.

CAPITAL HORSE SHOW OPENS

Society Out in Force—Alfred G. Vanderbilt's Sir James Withdrawn.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, May 8.—General J. A. Buchanan, United States Army, retired, President of the National Capital Horse Show, and his fellow-officers of that organization are being congratulated tonight on the auspicious opening today of what is declared to be the most successful horse show given south of New York. All of the seventy-five boxes were occupied, with the grandstand and the promenade about the oval filled with interested spectators representing all the sport-loving element of Washington and near-by Maryland and Virginia.

The loss of the Lusitania caused notable absentees from the diplomatic circle, which is always a strong social feature at the annual exhibition of sport and fashion. The box reserved for President Wilson was occupied by his niece, Mrs. Perin Cothron, a guest at the White House, who, with several friends, was escorted by Dr. Cary T. Grayson, the White House physician. Officers from Fort Myer in full uniform were present in larger numbers than ever before. The music was by the Engineers' Band from the Washington Barracks.

The withdrawal of Sir James, owned by Alfred G. Vanderbilt and entered in the gig horse class that came into the ring shortly after 3 o'clock, was an incident of the afternoon that cast a gloom over the members of the several box parties who understood the significance of the "scratch."

The appearance of E. T. Stotesbury's Ruby and Lasca, which later took the blue ribbon and $50, was greeted with great applause. A. W. Atkinson of Merchantville, Va., was also among the winners of this first session, taking a blue with his heavy harness pair.

Apart from the sport, in which the polo ponies and the military hunters held first place, was the flower sale in aid of the Diet Kitchen, which furnishes pure milk to Washington's poor babies. Notwithstanding the opposition in high places to the sale of the blue cornflower, which many persons consider the national flower of Germany, that distinctive blossom decorated the lapel of nine out of every ten coats seen at the show, and also appeared in large clusters in many of the boxes. The great number of men and women who wore or used the much-discussed blossom maintained, as have the promoters of the charity for which it was sold, that it had no national significance and was used merely to obtain contributions to the funds of a deserving charity.

Mrs. Richard Townsend, Miss Mary Gwynn, Mrs. Carl Vrooman, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. Henry Cleveland Perkins, Mrs. Henry May, and Miss Isabel May were a few of the prominent cornflower wearers. In marked contrast, Mrs. Larz Anderson, wife of a former Minister to Belgium and one of the most generous contributors to the relief of that country, wore a large corsage of crimson roses.

The dressing was much less elaborate than in past years, with a marked preference for simply tailored suits of gaberdine or silk. Mrs. William Hitt, just back from a Winter in California, wore a battleship gray voile with satin facings of the same color, with mushroom hat trimmed in roses. Mrs. Joseph Leiter wore a pongee coat suit with large white hat. Miss Isabel May wore a gown of blue and white striped voile with military cape of blue cloth, the blue matching her cornflower bouquet. Mrs. Ned McLean wore a one-piece suit of dull pink, with hat to match trimmed in blue velvet ribbon. Mrs. Sheridan wore a gray silk suit with black hat. Mrs. William Du Pont of Delaware wore a brown silk tailored gown, with hat covered in yellow wheat.

To Meet to Oppose Direct Tax.

Acting Mayor McAneny on account of an official engagement with the officers of the visiting fleet will be unable to speak tomorrow night at a meeting of the Real Estate Owners' Protective Association, to be held in the Hotel Majestic, to protest against the Direct State Tax. He will, however, send a letter explaining his views. A resolution will be offered calling upon Governor Whitman to veto all appropriation bills and the Direct Tax bill, now before him, and to call an extraordinary session of the Legislature to go over again the appropriations for the coming year.

Bath Promoters to Meet Here.

The American Association for the Promotion of Hygiene and Public Baths will hold its fourth annual convention at the City Hall from Tuesday to Thursday. They will be welcomed on Tuesday morning by Borough President Marks. The annual address will be delivered by the President, Dr. Simon Baruch, at a public meeting in the Academy of Medicine, on Tuesday evening. Mrs. Baruch will give a reception to the members of the association on Tuesday evening at her residence, 51 West Seventieth Street.

MARGARET PORTER BRIDE IN COUNTRY

Married to J. Horton Ijams in Little Trinity Church at Hewlett, L. I.

THE WEDDING ATTENDANTS

H. Hobart Porter Gives His Daughter in Marriage—Reception at Lauderdale—The Guests.

The wedding yesterday afternoon of J. Horton Ijams, the son of Mr. and Mrs. John Tabb Ijams, and Miss Margaret Seton Porter, at Hewlett, L. I., was one of the largest of the Spring country weddings, and was attended by guests from town and the adjoining Long Island country estates. It was celebrated in Trinity Church at Hewlett, a charming little brown wood church set well back from the roadway in the midst of green lawns framed with many trees, showing all the different tints of Spring green in their foliage. The church was banked with marguerites and other white flowers, with masses of verdure here and there, and the wedding ceremony was performed by the Rev. William F. Kempner, the rector of the church, assisted by the Rev. R. Townsend Henshaw of Christ Church at Rye, N. Y.

The bride, who walked up the aisle with her father, H. Hobart Porter, who gave her in marriage, wore a soft white satin gown draped with old point lace, with a long court train falling from the shoulder. The corsage was low in front, but had a high Medici collar at the back, and the skirt was draped. A voluminous tulle veil was held in cap fashion about her coiffure with orange blossoms, and her flowers were a round bouquet of lilies of the valley. Miss Dorothy Dwight Porter was her sister's maid of honor. She wore a short, very full skirted gown of white net over pale green, showing five pale green ribbon tucks around it, and the quaint, low-cut green satin corsage had draped folds and short sleeves. Her large cream straw hat was rolled up at one side and trimmed with tea roses, and she carried an armful of tea roses.

The bridesmaids were the Misses Helvetia Orr of Chicago, Dorothy Anderton, Helen de Forest Griffin, Margaret R. Warren, Louise Dixon, and Gertrude B. Pardee of New York. Their frocks had high-waisted green satin corsages, with very full and short skirts of cream net, each banded with five pale green ribbons. Their large hats had cream straw crowns and frilled brims of cream net and were decorated with pinkish yellow tea roses. All carried large clusters of Ophelia roses. There were two little flower girls, Miss Katharine Delano Porter, the younger sister of the bride, and Miss Alison Philips, who wore short waisted frocks of white silk with wide pale green girdles and white tulle poke bonnets with touches of pale green in the ties and bows, and carried baskets of Spring flowers.

The bridegroom had Wilder Goodwin as his best man, and the ushers were Seton Porter, an uncle of the bride; William B. Boulton, Jr., Dr. G. Adams Leland, Jr., of Boston, Antonio Iazo, Sidney Henshaw, Ross R. Harrison, J. Fahys Cook, and Harry M. Addinsell.

From the litle church the guests who were not in their own motors, were carried in busses to the Porter country place, Lauderdale, at Lawrence, where the reception was held.

The bridal party, with Mrs. Porter, received in the large drawing room of Lauderdale, which is a large, rambling, picturesque structure with wide-long verandahs, and tables for the breakfast were set on the smooth level lawns under the trees, while in the house an orchestra played for dancing throughout the afternoon.

A special train left the Pennsylvania Station at 2 o'clock, and returning left Hewlett shortly after 6, but many motored down and left at their own convenience. There were many young people present.

Among those at the house were the Misses Susanne Warren, Dorothy Keene Taylor, Constance Peabody, Margery and Eugenie Rand, Roxana Wentworth Bowen, Caramal Carroll, Elizabeth Clapp, Coline Ingersoll, Barbara Shedd, Eleanor Keep, Amy Johnson, Elizabeth Kirlin, Elise H. MORE JEWS LEARN TRADES.

Hebrew Technical Institute Reports a Growing Attendance.

The commencement exercises of the Hebrew Technical Institute in Stuyvesant Street will be held at Cooper Union next Wednesday evening. The annual report of the institution states that it has 295 pupils—the largest number in its history.

The Directors say that if the Hebrew Technical Institute had in the thirty-one years of its existence done no more than to divert the constant stream of Jewish youth from law and medicine into the practical arts its mission would have been worth while. Seventy-five per cent. of those trained by the institute are working in lines for which they were prepared in the institute, demonstrating that Jewish mechanics can be successful. To accommodate many boys who have applied for admission an additional building has been put up at a cost of $150,000, $30,000 of which has still to be raised. Last year's expenditure amounted to $54,221, against an income of $51,866.

The institute has expended in the thirty-one years of its existence $1,200,000, and the combined earnings of its graduates last year amounted to $1,680,000. The pupils are employed in wood and metal working, tool, instrument, and pattern making, architectural drawing, carving, and electrical and other branches of engineering. Joseph L. Buttenweiser is President of the institute, Irving Lehman and Eugene E. Spiegelberg are Vice Presidents, and Mortimer L. Schiff is Treasurer.

Of the purchase price, the report shows, $100,000 has been paid, and notes for $200,000, indorsed by Dreicer & Co., are outstanding.

The widow, Mrs. Julia Page Sampson, receives a life interest in the house at 14 West Fifty-eighth Street, and the contents, which are appraised at $163,429, and the income for life from one-third of the residuary estate, which is valued at $926,210. FLEXNER HASTENS SERUM PRODUCTION

New Experiments Result in Making Antidysenteric Agent in Ten Weeks.

DEMAND INCREASED BY WAR

Rockefeller Institute Head One of the Discoverers of Bacilli Which Cause the Disease.

As the result of sudden demands made upon the resources of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research by the outbreaks of the European war, Dr. Simon Flexner, Director of the Institute, and one of his associates, Dr. Harold L. Amoss, have devised a method for the rapid production of antidysenteric serum. Formerly it took a year to produce an adequate serum in the horse. By the new method the same result can be accomplished in ten weeks.

The method of production is described in the current issue of The Journal of Experimental Medicine. The work leading up to the discovery was carried on in the laboratories of the Rockefeller Institute.

"A side issue of the European war has been the unexpected and great demand for certain therapeutic sera," the physicians state. "Among those for which a sudden demand has arisen is the antidysenteric serum, of which in the recent past large quantities have not been needed. It is doubtful whether the serum was being produced in notable quantities in any of the countries involved in the war, so that when dysentery appeared among the troops engaged in the western campaign, supplies of the serum were sought outside.

"Among the early activities of the Rockefeller Institute was included a systematic investigation, in the eastern part of the United States, of the bacteriology of acute dysentery and related diseases of the intestine. An important incident of this investigation was the preparation and testing upon human subjects of the antidysenteric serum. Doubtless it was the knowledge of these results possessed abroad that led to the requests made upon the Rockefeller Institute for supplies of the serum. This demand, which was met subsequently as supplies then available, led us to undertake the improvement of the method of preparing the serum, with the particular object in view of reducing the period required for the immunization of horses.

Reinjections Are Helpful.

"The outlook for success in this endeavor was hopeful, since the experience of the past few years had shown that certain antisera could be prepared in small animals—the rabbit especially—in far shorter periods of time than had been supposed. We owe especially to the studies of Fornet and Müller, Bonhoff, and Tsuzuki, and Gay and his pupils the discovery of the fact that the injection of antigenic (immunizing) substances at brief intervals leads to intensification of the antibody (substances acting against bacterial poisons) formation. In this manner and through the successive daily injections of proteins, bacterial or body cells, we have applied the principles of this method to the immunization of a horse with several types of the dysentery bacilli, with the result to be described.

"Two distinct groups of bacilli capable of causing dysentery are now distinguished. As far as is known the members of the group bring about similar if indistinguishable intestinal lesions and clinical symptoms. As regards ordinary morphological and cultural characters the groups are also indistinguishable, while they are readily distinguished by their power to ferment certain carbohydrates and alcohols (especially mannite), and by the important fact that one group yields in the cultures a soluble toxin and the other does not. The original of the dysentery bacillus, the name of the Japanese bacteriologist who first isolated and studied the dysenteric bacillus. It happens that the Shiga bacillus possesses limited fermentative power and produces a soluble toxin.

"Dysenteric bacilli identical with the Shiga bacillus have been obtained everywhere in the Eastern, Western, and Southern Hemispheres in which they have been sought by bacteriological science. The Shiga bacilli constitute the original group of dysenteric bacilli. They also compose a homogeneous group since all the Shiga bacilli so far studied possess identical properties.

Called the Flexner Group.

"This is not true of the second group, which includes several quite well-defined varieties. The first representative of this group was isolated by Flexner in cases of acute dysentery occurring in the Philippine Islands. Hence in order to distinction to the Shiga group, it has become customary to speak of the latter as the Flexner group. But, as already indicated, the latter is heterogeneous and contains two or more other forms of closely related but nevertheless distinguishable bacilli, sometimes designated as Flexner and Strong. None of the varieties of this group yields a soluble toxin; and while they all show wider fermentation reactions than the Shiga bacillus, yet the several members differ in that respect among themselves. Very recently Sonne has described still another variant belonging in this group, which he cultivated from several cases of acute dysentery occurring in Copenhagen.

"But the most important distinguishing feature exhibited by the dysentery bacilli relates to their antigenic or immunizing properties. By employing specifically the agglutination test (aggregation of small masses of bacteria when the specific immune serum is added) and to a less extent the test of protection, the Shiga and Flexner groups are more distinct, and the several members of the latter group less sharply, separated from one another.

"As regards the practical question of the specific therapy of dysentery, the most important consideration is that of protection. It is manifestly impossible to undertake to discriminate in many instances among cases of dysentery occurring sporadically in endemics or epidemics, the particular dysenteric bacillus causing the infection before applying the serum treatment. Two ways of proceeding are, therefore, indicated; first, to determine whether an antidysenteric serum prepared with the bacilli of one group protects against the bacilli of the other group; and, second, ascertain whether an effective polyvalent antidysenteric serum suitable for use irrespective of the type of infecting bacillus can be prepared."

A polyvalent serum is a serum containing antibodies produced by the injection of several strains of the same species of micro-organism.

Injection of Horses.

Indeed, it has long been known that the dysenteric bacilli posses both common and specific antigenic (immunizing) properties; a certain amount of cross-agglutination and protection exists, which is more pronounced between the related members of the Flexner group than between the more widely separated Flexner and Shiga groups. Again, it has been found practicable to procure in a given horse by suitable methods of immunization antibodies for the two groups of bacilli, and in quantities which promise to suffice for practical therapeutic purposes.

"This fact is not only important as regards the treatment of cases of bacillary dysentery infected with a single strain—the rule among cases ordinarily arising—but is significant also in respect to the rarer instances of mixed strain infection, in which more than one member of the Flexner group, or in which the Shiga bacillus and a member of the Flexner group co-operate in causing the lesions and other effects of the disease.

"Hitherto horses have been injected with cultures or soluble products of the dysenteric bacilli over long periods of time. The injections have been made chiefly into the subcutaneous tissues, rarely into the veins. The severe reactions which intravenous injections often cause limited that method of immunization. The subcutaneous injections, on the other hand, are more readily carried out, but at the stage of the immunization process when large quantities of culture—or, in the case of the Shiga bacillus, soluble toxin—must be injected, large infiltrations may arise which sometimes ulcerate and depress the physical condition of the animals.

"The process of immunization is then halted until the ulcer heals and the general condition improves, entailing a loss of time; but in some instances a state of cachexia (condition of debility) arises, leading to loss by death. By employing the subcutaneous method of immunization, an active antiserum can be prepared in from about nine to twelve months.

Successive Inoculations Best.

"The process can be abbreviated by employing the method of successive intravenous inoculations over brief periods of time, with intervening periods of rest. The principles of the method are those developed by Fornet and Müller, Bonhoff and Tsuzuki, and Gay and his pupils. By injecting successively the several varieties of dysenteric bacilli, a serum possessing high agglutinative and protective value has been secured in a period measured by weeks rather than by months."

The method of making the cultures and injections into the animals are described in detail, as well as the method of determining the degree of immunity produced by the several successive inoculations. The authors continue:

"The therapeutic value of the serum was tested experimentally in guinea pigs and rabbits. The anti-infectious power was determined in the former and the antitoxic power for Shiga toxin in the latter animals. The protective value of the antiserum was compared with that of normal serum withdrawn from the horse before inoculation was begun. The anti-infectious power of the normal serum was determined with two minimal lethal doses of the cultures, and the antitoxic power with four minimal lethal doses of toxin. In the former instance, the total volume of each of the mixtures was two, in the latter one cubic centimeter.

"Normal horse serum exerts slight protection only against the infectious or toxic effects of the dysentery bacilli. The limit of activity for two minimal lethal doses of the living cultures and for four minimal lethal doses of Shiga toxin is about 0.5 of a cubic centimeter of the normal serum.

Comparing the Values.

"With this value are to be compared the values of the serum after ten weeks' immunization. For the corresponding Shiga and Flexner bacilli it is 0.008, and for the Shiga toxin 0.003 of a cubic centimeter.

"The protective and agglutination values resemble each other in appearing early and rising rapidly in the course of immunization. In view of this rapid development the serum should be suitable for therapeutic employment in man at the end of eight or ten weeks' immunization. Doubtless the continuation of the inoculations would result in still further accumulation of specific antibodies. But it seems safe to begin regular bleeding of the horses treated in the manner described at the tenth week of the immunization process and to carry out regular bleeding with intervening inoculation from that period on."

DARLINGTON WRITES OF DOCTORS' BILLS

Compensation Commissioner Says Infected Wounds Are on the Increase.

DEFORMITIES ARE FIXED

Suggests That Many Business Men Die Because of Haste in the Midday Meal.

Dr. Thomas Darlington, Commissioner of the New York State Workmen's Compensation Commission, and formerly Health Commissioner of this city, is the author of an interesting article on the workmen's compensation law from medical standpoints which appears in the current issue of American Medicine.

A year's experience in dealing with the administration of this law has revealed many things that are not apparent from a merely casual consideration of it, the doctor says.

One of the most vital phases of the problem of workmen's injuries, as shown by the examination of those applying for compensation in the last year, is the vast number of permanent deformities resulting from septicæmia, or blood poisoning, which could have been prevented if proper first aid had been rendered when the injuries were received. The medical examiners found that no less than one in six, or 17 per cent., were needlessly incapacitated for life as the result of preventable infection of wounds—largely the result of carelessness, it is stated, on the part of the physicians who were called to attend the injured workmen.

Dr. Darlington further states that autopsies should be performed in all cases of sudden death among workmen, to determine the actual cause of heart failure. He suggests the idea that many such deaths result from restricted diet, and adds that many sudden deaths of business men may be due to a failure to take time to eat a midday meal.

The commission holds that as a rule an injured workman should be allowed to have the physician of his choice. About $40,000, or 28 per cent. of premiums is paid annually to doctors in this State from the State Insurance Fund.

The Law Interests Physicians.

This is what Commissioner Darlington says:

"There are many things in the New York State workmen's compensation law—both in the law itself and in its administration—that are of interest to the physician. The law takes much from the lawyer and gives it to the doctor. Before passage of this law a large majority of these accident cases were treated at hospitals and clinics free of charge. Those treated in hospitals were largely charged against the city and were paid for by general taxation. Now the industry pays these charges. Formerly many who went to physicians' offices were able to pay little, if anything; now the law requires the employer to pay at reasonable rates for the physicians' services.

"Let me quote two sections of the law and comment a little upon them:

13. Treatment and Care of Injured Employes—The employer shall promptly provide for the injured employe such medical, surgical, or other attendance or treatment, nurse and hospital services, medicines, crutches, and apparatus as may be required or be requested by the employe during sixty days after the injury. If the employer fails to provide the same, the injured employe may do so at the expense of the employer. The employe shall not be entitled to recover any amount expended by him for such treatment or services unless he shall have requested the employer to furnish the same and the employer shall have refused or neglected to do so. All fees and other charges for such treatment and services shall be subject to regulation by the commission, as provided in Section 24 of this chapter, and shall be limited to such charges as prevail in the same community for similar treatment of injured persons of a like standard of living.

24. Cost and Fees—If the commission or the court before which any proceedings for compensation or concerning an award of compensation have been brought under this chapter determines that such proceedings have not been so brought upon reasonable ground, it shall assess the whole cost of the proceeding upon the party who has so brought them. Claims for legal services in connection with any claim arising under this chapter, and claims for services of treatment rendered or supplies furnished pursuant to Section 13 of this chapter, shall not be enforceable unless approved by the commission. If so approved, such claim or claims shall become a lien upon the manner fixed by the commission.

Doctors' Bills Discussed.

"Law must be interpreted in the light of reason. In deciding what is reasonable and proper each individual case must stand by itself upon the necessities of that particular case. The first question which naturally arises is, What may an employe request? May he request to be attended by his own physician? It is well known that confidence in one's physician is a good portion of the battle toward recovery. Is the request of an employe to have his own physician a reasonable request? The commission thinks that usually it is.

"Another problem on which the commission has frequently to pass is the amount of physicians' bills. These bills are not collected by the commission. If the employer or the insurance carrier protest the bill, the commission may pass upon the amount involved and state what it thinks is reasonable and proper charge. But the commission cannot enforce the payment. That is for a court to do. Under Sections 13 and 24 of the law, read together, medical service extending beyond sixty days may be made a lien upon the compensation awarded to the workman.

"As physicians' fees differ somewhat in different communities and under different standards of living, the commission has not adopted any general schedule of fees. Nevertheless, as it is necessary to calculate premium rates and the medical services in most cases is a part of the insurance, there must be some fee schedule for insurance carriers to work from. As a kind of index, it may be said that in the State Insurance Fund the amount calculated to be necessary to pay for the medical services is 28 per cent. of the sums collected. In other words, it is calculated that the amount paid physicians annually by the State Insurance Fund is $400,000.

"The second thing to which I would call attention is the large number of septic wounds. An observer at a public hearing of the New York State Workmen's Compensation Commission, noting the victims of accidents as they appear there, would be impressed with the large number of deformities of fingers and hands due to infection of wounds. Case after case has come before the commission where such poisoning has resulted in necrosis of bone and made necessary its removal; or tendons have been invested of their sheaths and become fastened to the tissues and will no longer function; or the muscle itself has been destroyed by an abscess; or nerves have been ruined, causing paralysis; or joints have become ankylosed and will not bend. As a result, fingers and the hands become deformed, twisted, and useles. Thousands of dollars in compensation have been lost, and many a good workman has been needlessly incapacitated for life.

"Of the 15,000 cases in which awards were made by the New York State Workmen's Compensation Commission during 1914, 2,100 cases were examined by the Medical Department. Of these, a little over 17 per cent., or one in every six, were due to septic infection. Of the total number of cases the percentage of infection was probably much higher. Had it not been for such infection, the large majority of these cases would have recovered within the period prescribed by the law as the test for non-compensable minor accidents, to the manifest advantage of all concerned.

Infected Wounds Decrease.

"Where formerly in the American iron and steel industry about half of the wounds were infected, now little more than one per thousand cases of injury become infected. This shows what can be done in lessening such infection, in preventing loss of time, in saving payment of compensation, and, above all, in preventing the horrible deformities which mean so much in the life of the victims of accident.

"From the dressings removed in many cases it would seem to be carelessness or lack of interest on the part of the physician, for no physician could be quite so uneducated as to apply some of the dressings we have seen."

MONKEYS CRY OVER FINGER-PRINT TEST

Central Park Simians Weep Bitterly as Paws Are Recorded by the Police.

RECRUITS TO STUDY THEM

New Patrolmen Must Pick Lines of Animals from Those of Human Subjects.

Almost every monkey in the Central Park monkey house was led, crying and ashamed, up to a platter of black printer's ink yesterday afternoon. Then he had to watch, while his "fingers" were dipped in the ink and then pressed upon sheets of white paper.

After the ceremonies, the monkeys continued jabbering to themselves and inspecting their forepaws to see what had happened to them. Policeman Patrick Ryan, who had charge of the professional work upon the monkeys, announced that they had been "finger printed" and carried away a score or more sheets of paper, which he said would constitute a "Simian Rogues' Gallery," by which any roguish monkey that might escape from the zoo could be easily identified as zoo property.

But it seemed that making a Rogues' Gallery of the caged monkeys was not the primary object of the finger printing, as Keeper Snyder, who caught the monkeys and comforted them while they were "finger printed," insisted that they were held in the toils quite firmly already and were not likely to get abroad or fall into the hands of the police.

Just what the purpose of taking the finger prints was Policeman Ryan was reluctant to say. But he pointed out that the finger prints of "Bill" and "Bob," two baboons, were so near to the prints of the human finger that they could be sent in as human finger prints and would probably pass all examiners and be duly classified in the record.

There was a slight hint in the proceedings that the finger prints were to be assorted among human finger prints and turned over to policemen in the finger print school to see how easily they could pick out human finger prints from the monkey prints.

Lemur Has Least Humanlike Paw.

As the finger-print experts pressed the paws of the monkeys of the lower classes on the sheets of paper they obtained impressions less and less like the palm of the human hand. The last monkey they experimented with was a black-and-white faced lemur, the lowest member of the monkey family known.

When Keeper Snyder entered the lemur's cage to capture him for the finger printers, the lemur grunted, instead of crying like a hurt baby—as most of the other monkeys had done. The lemur's paw failed to show up prints that would pass as human at all. Instead of fingers composed of sweat glands and an infinitely large number of "whirls" and "delta" formation of lines, there was an appearance of a cat's foot, except that at the end of each division there was a round cushion in which the "whirls" shaped themselves in almost perfect circles.

Of all the monkeys submitted to the finger-print test Knocko, a two-year-old ring-tail monkey, showed the most grief. Maybe this was because Knocko was the first to be brought out of his cage, and hadn't heard in monkey talk, as the others seemed to later, that it was all right. Knocko opened a mouth that showed a fine dental display of "baby teeth," such as a young child might have, and sought to bite Keeper Snyder's wrist. Knocko did his best to clench his tiny fists, but for all that each one was printed on the paper, and then Knocko cuddled up on the arm of Snyder and seemed to take heart again. His cry changed to a chattering bit of patter that was immediately caught up and repeated through every cage.

Cagemate Would Save Mike.

Mike, from Java, came next, and it was a little hard to get him, for in his cage was also Jennie, who knew a cry of alarm when she heard one and was willing to fight for her cagemate. Mike did not utter a sound after he was taken out of the cage until curiosity caused him to speak up as he saw his finger prints. As they worked with his right paw he tried to reach the ink roller with his left, and then he squinted an eye at a ring on the finger of Miss Marion Sullender, who was filing the completed finger-print records. Mike tried to pick up the piece of paper containing his finger prints, and when he was taken back to his cage he spoke in a hopeful tone about it all that seemed to reassure the others.

Green Sallie, the next monkey surrendered without a struggle and submitted, with an alert twitching of her ears, to the whole proceeding. Snyder said she was the only monkey in the place with power to twitch her ears.

Maria, a German monkey that once was in a trained troupe, stood on her head as she saw Bill Snyder unlocking the door to her cage. But when Snyder caught Maria by the neck instead of handing her the goddies she had expected, she set up a loud lament. Seven tiny monkeys in a cage together took up the call, and it did not cease until Maria was back among her playfellows.

Policeman Ryan said he believed his finger-print series would lead all the first ever made in which a series was taken from the lowest to the highest of the monkey family. He said he was going up to the Bronx Zoo to take finger prints of the gorilla, the chimpanzee and the orang-utan, so that his finger print series would lead all the way up through the primates to the very top.

A curious thing about the monkey finger prints, Policeman Ryan and Miss Sullender agreed, was that the combination of "deltas" and "whirls" found normally on the finger tips of men, were found in the monkeys at the bases of the "fingers," and along the palms of the paws at the finger base line.

A special dinner of sweet potatoes was served to the monkeys as soon as the ordeal was over to restore them to good humor and a cheerful view of life.

ALLEGED BURGLAR IS SHOT.

Police Say Alfred Kneib Was Found in Gumprecht's Music Store.

Charged with forcing an entrance to the music store of Isadore Gumprecht at 1,713 Third Avenue, two men were arrested yesterday morning after one of them had been shot in the right ankle. The men described themselves as Charles Hoffman, 19 years old, of 1,807 Second Avenue, and Alfred Kneib of the same age, who refused to give his address. An additional charge was lodged against Kneib for violation of the Sullivan law, and he was removed to Reception Hospital, where it was said his condition was serious.

Patrolman Connors discovered the light in the store had been extinguished. He saw a form dangling from the transom. He grabbed the man, who proved to be Hoffman, and then rapped for assistance. Patrolman Hettrick and another patrolman from the East Eighty-eighth Street Station responded, and Hettrick climbed over the transom. Kneib, the police say, ran to the rear as the patrolman fired twice.

Kneib was found under a counter in the rear of the store, and on the floor was a loaded .44-calibre revolver, which the police say Kneib admitted was his. was his.

Hoffman was arraigned before Magistrate McQuade in Harlem Court and held without bail for examination today.

City Club to Advocate Home Rule.

The City Club is forming a committee to advocate home rule before the State Constitutional Convention. The first meeting of the committee will be held on Friday night at the club, and a temporary organization will then be formed to represent the social, economic, and political forces of the city. The committee will be non-partisan, and those signing the circular inviting membership are William J. Schieffelin, Chairman of the Citizens' Union; Jacob C. Klinck, E. H. Outerbridge, and Joseph M. Price.

TO REWARD ABLE FIREMEN.

Committee Planning System to Recognize Efficient Service.

Bravery and efficiency in the Fire Department hereafter will receive due recognition in accordance with plans which are being made by a special committee of Fire Department officers. The members of this committee are: W. Holden Weeks and Richard H. Laimbeer, Jr., Deputy Commissioners; John Kenlon, Chief of the Fire Department; Thomas Lally, Joseph B. Martin, Patrick Maher, and Thomas R. Langford, Deputy Chiefs; Henry P. Kirk, Chief of Battalion, and Michael F. Ruddy, Captain.

The purpose is to distinguish in a proper manner between those members of the Fire Department who perform conspicuously efficient service and those of mediocre ability. Under the old system the most highly efficient fireman received the same rating as the shirker. The committee will meet at Fire Headquarters at 10:30 o'clock next Tuesday morning.

Four Waterman Clerks Arrested.

Four men, charged with acting in concert in the theft of $500 worth of fountain pens from the L. E. Waterman Company, at 173 Broadway, were arrested in Broadway yesterday by Detectives Clare, Whalen, and Brown of the First Branch. The prisoners, all employes of the Waterman Company, are Archibald Christman, a clerk, of 1,125 Flatbush Avenue, Brooklyn; Joseph Grace, a clerk, of 191 New Jersey Avenue, Brooklyn; Joseph Cheudreux, a collector, of 710 Leonard Street, Brooklyn, and Christian Herfel, a clerk, of 98 Forbell Street, Brooklyn.

When the cold, snappy days are gone you will feel the reaction. Then is the time to take Hoff's Extract. It will assist digestion and build up the system.

BUY UP PIG IRON FOR INVESTMENT

Pittsburgh Capitalists Purchase Between 75,000 and 100,000 Tons in Expectation of Rise.

BUILDING MORE SHIPS

Contracts Let for Three, Making a Total of 31 Called For Here Since the Start of the War.

Special to The New York Times.

PITTSBURGH, May 8.—Capitalists not connected with the steel making industry have shown their fatih in the future trend of the market by buying for investment between 75,000 and 100,000 tons of pig iron of various grades. Northern and southern iron were purchased by the speculators. This is not the first time that outsiders have entered the pig iron market when prices scraped the bottom. In almost every case such speculation has rebounded to the advantage of the investors if they did not hold stocks too long.

Pig iron has not been largely dealt in by those not in the business. During boom times, or when the market is very stiff, producers have refused to sell to speculators, making sure that consumers alone were the real buyers. In times like the present, when cash is the first consideration, furnace owners are glad to sell to any one.

All southern iron has been advanced from 25 to 50 cents a ton. No. 2 foundry is quoted at $10, Birmingham. Iron for prompt delivery can be had for $9.75, Birmingham, but for forward delivery the higher price must be paid. It is estimated that fully 250,000 tons of iron were sold by the Birmingham furnaces during April. Much of this has been purchased to be held for higher prices. One sales manager alleges his company has sold $1,250,000 in pig iron since the first of the year. Another claims to have closed sales amounting to 80,000 tons during April.

Northern iron has not been so active during the past week. The clean-up made by Buffalo furnaces several weeks ago took care of a large amount of the iron which will be required during the next three months. The valley furnace owners are not so pinched for cash as are operators in other sections of the country, and they refuse to let their iron go at the low levels, and are also holding up for better prices for forward delivery. Hence there has not been much speculative iron purchased from the valley furnaces. Basic is holding at $12.65, valleys, an increase of 15 cents a ton above former quotations. The Westinghouse Machine Company has closed for 4,000 tons of foundry iron for third and fourth quarter delivery at about $12.50, valleys. Sales by Chicago dealers during April were five times as great as sales made during last March.

Three more vessels have been contracted for, making a total of thirty-one since the beginning of the year. The Harlan & Hollingsworth Company received a contract for an 8,000-ton tank steamship from the Anglo-Saxon Petroleum Company, making a third of this type being built for that company, and also a 7,400-gross-ton tank steamer for the Mexican Petroleum Company. The Fore River Shipbuilding Company will build a tank steamer for the Cuban Distilling Company. As a result 7,500 tons of plates will be required, of which 5,000 tons have already been placed. The Maryland Steel Company has under contracts seven merchant vessels, all taken recently.

The Pennsylvania Railroad has placed orders for 20,000 to 25,000 tons of steel, mostly plates, for the 2,100 cars to be built at Altoona. The Carnegie, Cambria, and another company divided the business. The Reading Railroad has placed an order for plates for locomotives to be built at its own shops. Plates are quoted at 1.20c. This had weakened to 1.15c, and it is said one western company is taking business on the basis of 1.10c Pittsburgh.

There is quite an active demand for light steel plates for car sidings, in which the mills in the Middle West are interested. Prices on light plates have been firmer as a result, although there continues to be a large idle capacity.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company has purchased 2,500 tons of No. 12 gauge sheets for siding for box cars being made at the Altoona shops. Owing to the price of spelter, galvanized sheets have been increased to 3.00c and above for No. 28 gauge. The American Sheet and Tin Plate Company continues to quote 3.40c. In some cases sheet makers have stopped producing galvanized sheets, and in others they have refused to make quotations. As a result of the high cost of galvanized sheets, painted sheets are in better demand.

Tin plate has weakened somewhat, owing to the fact that the bulk of sales for the season's canning trade has been made. Tin plate mills continue to operate almost to capacity. It is reported that offers as low as $3.10 for base boxes have been made, although $3.20 is the nominal quotation.

Iron and steel pipe have advanced $2 a ton, resulting in an advance by producers of iron pipe. Wrought iron boiler tubes have been set up one point or $2 a ton. The last increase in pipe was made last February.

Steel bars are firm at all points, especially in the East. Agricultural implement makers are up against competition with the European allies in contracting for steel. Contracts will soon have to be placed for deliveries from July 1 to Jan. 1, and the base quotations are said to be 1.20c, Pittsburgh. As other steel products, notably, structural shapes, light rails, &c., are selling at less than steel bars, the spread is notable.

The large amount of steel being worked up into shrapnel and shells has been the cause of the higher cost of steel bars. It is reported that the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Company is negotiating for the buildings of the J. Stevens Arms & Tool Company, Springfield, Mass., to turn out some of the war orders booked. Bar iron is selling at 1.15c, Chicago mill. The American Steel & Wire Company is operating its plants at 90 per cent. of capacity.

GAIN IN GOLD HELD BY RESERVE BANKS

New York Leads, with Increase of $3,800,000—System's Paid-In Capital About $53,500,000.

SLIGHT DECREASE IN LOANS

Loss of About $1,200,000 in Thirty-Day Paper—Acceptances Also Show a Decrease.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, May 8.—The Federal Reserve Board's weekly summary indicates a substantial gain in the total reserves and in the gold reserves of the Federal Reserve banks. The only banks which fail to show increased gold reserves are San Francisco, Richmond, and Chicago. The largest gain of $3,800,000 was reported by New York, while Cleveland and Boston report gains in excess of $1,000,000 each. The total gain in cash was $13,300,000, an amount but slightly below the $13,800,000 paid in during the week by member banks on account of the third installment of their capital payments. The paid-in capital of the Federal Reserve system stands now at about $53,500,000. This total may show a further increase by about $1,000,000 or $1,500,000 after delinquent member banks shall have made their payments in full.

Loans and discounts show a slight decrease. The decrease affects mainly the holdings of thirty-day paper, which show a loss of about $1,200,000. The holdings of sixty-day paper show an increase of about $280,000, while the amount of ninety-day paper held decreased about $460,000. Agricultural and livestock paper, maturing after ninety days, to the amount of $2,300,000, of which over 70 per cent. is held by the three Southern banks, constitutes at present about 6.4 per cent. of the total amount of paper held by the banks. The only banks reporting considerable gains for the week in the amount of domestic discounts held are Dallas and San Francisco.

Acceptances amounting to $12,358,000 likewise show a decrease for the past week, constituting at present 34.9 per cent. of the total loan and discounts, as against 37.8 per cent. at the end of the previous week. The New York bank reports $5,100,000 of this class of paper, a decrease of about $600,000 for the week.

No change is reported in the amount of United States bonds held by the banks. Investments in municipal and kindred securities amount at present to about $21,500,000 and show an increase for the week of about $2,800,000, the largest gainers being the New York and San Francisco banks. All other assets, mainly because of the smaller amounts of Federal Reserve notes and national bank notes in the hands of the banks, show a decrease of $2,100,000.

Deposits decreased about $1,500,000, New York, Philadelphia and Dallas reporting the largest net withdrawals. Federal Reserve agents report an increase in the amount of notes issued during the week of about $1,900,000.

KANSAS BANKS BOOMING.

Big Crops Send the Deposits Soaring Throughout the State.

Because of the biggest wheat crop Kansas has ever had or that was ever grown on a similar area of land and also because of the biggest war of the world, the deposits in the Kansas banks this year have broken all records.

W. F. Benson, State Bank Commissioner, recently gave out the compiled statement of the condition of the 940 State banks and trust companies. It showed actual deposits of $128,000,000, $10,000,000 more than was ever before reported by the Kansas banks; $21,000,000 more than a year ago and $15,000,000 more than two years ago.

The deposits in the 940 banks were $128,344,062.67. In the statement of Dec. 12, the deposits were $118,092,455.65. In March, a year ago, the deposits were $107,960,201.81. As well as the deposits the loan accounts of the banks showed an increase, which indicates that the business of the merchants, farmers and every one else was growing about as fast as the deposits.

The reserve accounts showed an increase over the December statement of 34 per cent. to 38 per cent. at the February statement, the highest legal reserve ever recorded in the State banks. The undivided profits and the dividends declared, but not paid, were materially decreased because of the regular dividend paying time following the annual bank meetings in January. The overdrafts were reduced more than $100,000.

ELEVATED CHANGES TO TAKE 7 MONTHS

Engineers Face a Difficult Task in Third-Tracking the Present Systems.

MUSTN'T DELAY SERVICE

Tracks Are Being Raised and Shifted Without Interrupting the Operation of Trains.

Within seven or eight months, it was announced yesterday by the Public Service Commission, the third tracking of the elevated roads in Manhattan and the Bronx will be partially completed and the new express service will be begun on some parts of the system. The lines to be enlarged thus are the Second, Third, and Ninth Avenue roads, of which the Second Avenue has no third track at all. On the other hand the Third Avenue line is now provided with a third track from Forty-second Street north and the Ninth Avenue from Christopher Street to 116th Street.

It has been found necessary for a complete third-track system to reconstruct a large part of the existing lines, and this has had to be done without in any way interfering with the operation of the train service. The work was designed by George H. Pegram, Chief Engineer of the Interborough, and has been approved by Alfred Craven, Chief Engineer of the Public Service Commission. It is being carried out under the supervision of C. V. V. Powers, Division Engineer of the commission, by T. A. Gillespie & Co., Snare & Triest, and Terry & Tench.

More than 50,000 tons of new steel will have been built into the old structures before the work is complete, that is more than was used for the elevated extensions of the present subway, and to do this has involved many delicate problems. At 125th Street on the Second Avenue line a mezzanine express station has been constructed beneath the floor of the tracks. That involved raising the existing rail bed from 123d to 128th Street seven feet. This was done without interruption to the trains by jacking up the whole structure by easy stages, and afterward building supporting pillars beneath. Then between 133d and 143d Streets on the Third Avenue line the track on the elevated structure had to be moved thirteen feet sideways without interferring with the trains.

The construction of express stations has caused a great deal of difficulty on account of the narrowness of some of the streets in which they had to be built. This, in some cases, has been overcome by double-decking the structure for a short distance. The express station is elevated above the local tracks, and access to its platform will be obtained from the local platforms, which remain as they are.

One great improvement will bring the Second Avenue trains into the City Hall station, instead of as at present requiring the passengers to change at Chatham Square. At Chatham Square the Second Avenue station will remain where it is, but the Third Avenue station will be moved south to Mott Street. From there a new four-track line will be built to the Brooklyn Bridge.

At first all the tracks will be on one level, but gradually the two for Second Avenue trains will rise, until they will run into the City Hall terminal on the upper level of a double-deck structure, 20 feet above the lower level for the Third Avenue trains. When the engineering work is completed, the Interborough will try to mask the ugly contours of the line by an architectural treatment in harmony with the plans of the Bridge Department for the improvement of Brooklyn Bridge.

Over the Harlem River at Third Avenue also there is to be a great change. The present two-track L bridge is to be removed and replaced by a double-deck bridge, on the lower level of which the Third Avenue and on the upper level the Second Avenue trains will run. The express stations on the Second Avenue line will be City Hall, Chatham Square, Fourteenth, Forty-second, Eighty-sixth and 125th Streets. On the Third Avenue line they will be City Hall, Chatham Square, Canal, Grand and Houston, Ninth, Twenty-third, Forty-second, 106th, 125th, 138th, 143rd, 149th and 177th Streets and Fordham Road. On the Ninth Avenue line they will be: Cortlandt, Warren, Desbrosses, Christopher, Fourteenth, Thirty-fourth, Sixty-sixth, 116th, 126th, 145th and 155th Streets.

Besides these new express stations, reconstruction will take place at these local stations: 156th, 161st, 166th, 160th Streets, Claremont Parkway and 174th and 180th Streets. Work on most of them has been begun.

Many Jobs Are Offered.

Walter L. Sears, Superintendent of the city's Public Employment Bureau, has given out a list of "help wanted" calls which his bureau has the opportunity to fill. Those wanted are a sewing machine repairer, fifty sheet metal workers experienced on automobile radiators, horseshoers, tool makers, carriage painters, stripers on auto work, operators on wood molding machines, shirt maker, boat builders and helpers, lithographer on china and porcelain, college graduate as clerk, six experienced accident insurance solicitors, with references, for work in Hoboken at $15 a week to start; and women are wanted as operators on ladies' waists and underwear, flower makers, operator on Singer embroidery machine, housemaids at $12-$22 per month, laundresses and second girls.

SUE CLAFLIN CORPORATION.

McCreerys Seek Receiver for Their Building in 23d Street.

The Associated Merchants' Company, that is controlled by H. B. Claflin & Co., was sued in the Supreme Court yesterday by the James McCreery Realty Corporation. The plaintiff asks for the appointment of a receiver for the premises in West Twenty-third Street recently occupied as a dry goods store by the Claflin Company under the name of James McCreery & Co.; for an order restraining the defendant or its agents from interfering with the property, and to compel the defendant to keep its agreement with the plaintiffs.

The realty company was incorporated in 1901 to handle the property owned by the McCreery estate. In November of the preceding year it completed arrangements for transferring to the Associated Merchants' Company the Twenty-third Street store. The complaint says that the defendant agreed to assume all the liabilities of the McCreery Company, amounting to about $1,000,000, and to take over the lease of the Twenty-third Street premises at a rental of $145,000 a year until 1921.

At the time the contract was made, the value of the good-will of the store, the use of the McCreery name, and the merchandise transferred were worth approximately $1,800,000, it is asserted. In 1906 the defendant moved the business to its present location in Thirty-fourth Street and has since used the Twenty-third Street property as a storage warehouse. This use of it, the complaint says, is greatly injuring it, and it is falling into disrepair.

YANKEES WIN—GIANTS LOSE TO BRAVES—PRINCETON BEATS COLUMBIA AND PENN CREWS

YANKS HEAP UP TEN RUNS IN AN INNING

Three Red Sox Pitchers Chased During New York's Terrific Bombardment.

The Yankees hatched the biggest inning in captivity at the Polo Grounds yesterday. It started against the Boston Red Sox in the fourth inning and lasted almost all afternoon. The trouble was, the Yankees refused to be put out. At one time it looked as if Boston would have to call the fleet over from the Hudson River to stop the Yankees, but finally, after they had scored ten runs and sixteen batsmen had faced a phalanx of Red Sox pitchers, "Wild Bill" Donovan got softness of the heart and called his pack off. The score was 10 to 3.

That fat inning was enough for any team for one day, so the Yanks did not break any harness trying to score any more. During the other eight innings the Boston team was fairly respectable. If they could cut out those bad innings now and then the Red Sox wouldn't lose so often. Ray Fisher did the pitching for the Yankees and won his fifth straight victory of the season. His record thus far is unblemished.

No record was taken of how long it took to play that overgrown inning, but one fan left the park early in the inning and went down to his Harlem flat at 125th Street, had a light luncheon, and when he got back it was still the fourth inning. President Ban Johnson of the American League was at the game, and when the inning was over he said he was going to present the Yankee and Red Sox players with new watches so they could see how the time flies during the afternoon.

Another thing, on account of the length of the long stanza the treatment of the hot dogs and sandwiches was something extremely unhumanitarian. Bill Evans, the umpire, says if they have many more innings like that the baseball season will be over about next Christmas. A pencil and a score card are no good in keeping track of an inning like that. It requires an expert accountant and an adding machine.

It's no easy matter for a ball player to get two hits in one inning. Indeed, some players can't get two hits in two weeks. Yesterday, however, Doc. Cook and Roy Hartzell each got two hits in the fourth inning. Hartzell and Hugh High each scored two runs in that same chapter also.

Manager Bill Carrigan of the Red Sox used up all his pitchers who were in good health and then had to call upon his concalescent invalid, Smoky Joe Wood, to come in and halt the Yanks in their turbulent career. First came Ray Collins, who wasn't very good; then came Carl Mays, who wasn't either. He was even worse.

The next figure stalking across to the pitchers' box, Mr. Toastmaster and fellow members of the Society for the Suppression of Employment, is Mister "North" Shore. Mr. Shore extends something like six feet, six inches, due north from his feet, and hence his nickname. Shore was with the Giants once upon a time, but Manager McGraw found out about him before he became a member of his baseball family.

Shore remained in until the inning was over and Joe Wood appeared and made it possible for the crowd of about 10,000 to get home in time for church today.

The frivolous fourth follows: Hartzell singled and High was safe on Wagner's error. Pipp singled, scoring Hartzell. Cook singled and the bases were filled, with no one out. Oh, yes, Collins was out—on his way to the clubhouse—but none of the Yankees were out.

Carl Mays started pitching with an underhand ball. Peckinpaugh forced Cook at second and High scored. Boone rolled to Scott, who tried to force Pipp at the plate, but the lanky first baseman was safe at home. Nunamaker singled, scoring Peck. Fisher singled, scoring Nunamaker.

This is a fine parade, but is there no end to it?

The line of march proceeded around the base paths. All that was lacking was a brass band, so that the players could keep in step. They were stepping on each other's heels. Battalion after battalion of Yankee players went by, and the big crowd gave them each a cheer.

More of it. Fritz Maisel singled. Then Carl Mays was sent to the concentration camp. "North" Shore then came into the carnival. Hartzell, the second time up in the inning, singled and scored Fisher, sending Maisel to third.

Maisel, saturated with the idea of moving ahead, couldn't keep still. So, as Shore was winding up his arm like a windmill, Maisel stole home. If the Boston players had worn any jewelry, Maisel would have stolen that, too. It was easy.

High walked and Pipp then flied to Speaker. Don't get impatient, this is still the fourth inning. Cook singled and filled the bases again. Hurrah! The game had taken on a close resemblance to dear old cricket. Peckinpaugh walked, pushing Hartzell in with another run.

Take heart, the end is soon coming. Boone got a single to deep short and scored High. Then Nunamaker grounded to Dick Hoblitzel and it was all over.

If you'll just trouble to run back you will find that the Yanks did not score fifty runs during that inning, but only ten.

Boston got two runs in the fourth on a pass to Speaker, Lewis's double, and errors by Nunamaker and High. Wood scored in the seventh on a single, aided by errors by Boone and Peckinpaugh. The score:

TINKER RUPTURES SIDE.

Chifed Manager May Have to Give Up Ball Playing.

CHICAGO, May 8.—Joe Tinker, manager of the Chicago team of the Federal League, has suffered a rupture in his right side and will be out of the game as a player for a month, if not for life, according to a dispatch to The Chicago Daily News from Newark, N. J., from a staff correspondent.

Before he left Chicago Tinker was warned to rest, owing to pains in his side, and his physician told him the penalty for disobedience would be an operation.

In the course of practice yesterday he felt something give in his side. He became nauseated and left the field, but directed the game from the bench. Toward the end of the game he came to bat as a pinch hitter and was struck by a pitched ball. Last night the case was diagnosed as rupture.

SCHAUER'S WILD PITCH BEATS GIANTS

Braves, with Their Usual Speed, Come Out Victorious in the Eleventh.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, May 8.—Although the Giants fought harder today than yesterday and "Rube" Marquard worked like a winner until he was replaced by a pinch hitter in the eighth, John McGraw's ball club was unable to take the measure of the Braves in a thrilling eleven-inning game, which Pitcher Schauer finally tossed into the discard with a wild pitch.

The Braves, getting two runs in the eleventh, whereas the Giants made only one, won the match, 4 to 3, and thus have a 4 to 1 edge over the old champions in the year's series so far. Today the new champions had mighty little on McGraw's men except an eleventh-hour punch, and this was truly characteristic of the speed which they developed for so many of last season's finishes.

Marquard in his seven innings' work allowed the Braves only three hits; two of them coming together in the fifth and the other in the sixth, providing the Braves with a run and a 2 to 1 lead after an eror by Third Baseman Lobert. In the eighth when Grant batted for Marquard Manager McGraw was chased out of the grounds for disputing a decision and later Schauer, taking up the burden, pitched fine ball down to the eleventh, the Giants tying the score in the ninth and looking good for the game when combined hits in the eleventh put them one ahead.

In the eleventh, however, the Braves got to Schauer for three hits, having made only four during the preceding ten innings against the two New York flingers. These did not do all the winning, however, for with men on third and second, and one out in the eleventh, Schauer let loose a wild pitch which was all that was necessary to hold the Giants in last place.

The Braves' action in the last inning came quickly enough. Gowdy led off with a double to left centre and Strand, who ran for him, moved up to third when Lobert failed to cover ground fast enough on a bunt by Pinch Hitter Gilbert. Moran then tapped a dinky one over Lobert's head to bring Strand home with the tying run and to advance Gilbert to second. Egan then sacrificed and it was immediately after this that Schauer made his fling to the backstop, thus delivering the solar plexus to himself.

The Giants outhit the Braves 12 to 7 today, doubling up the safties in three different innings and each time getting a run. The visitors drew away by a point in the second inning when Robertson doubled to left field and was brought home by Meyers's clean drive to centre. In the meantime Smith had thrown low after taking a drive from Brainerd, but Marquard spoiled chances for more runs by hitting into a double play. In the fifth Magee doubled to the bank and Schmidt bunted safe, Magee then scoring, while Fletcher was figuring on pulling a double play on Smith's bounder and without giving Sherwood a chance to get home.

In the sixth the Braves went ahead on Gowdy's single, two plays to first and Lobert's low throw to first on Egan, who should have easily been the third out. The McGraw mix-up took place in the eighth, and the Giants' leader seemed well within his rights. After Brainerd had singled and Meyers had fanned, Eddie Grant, batting for Marquard, hit to left field. Brainerd raced for third, but Cather drove the ball to second base to head off Grant. Eddie looked safe enough, but the umpire did not think so, disagreeing with McGraw, who, as is usual in such cases, got the worst of the argument which ensued. This surely hurt the Giants' chances to win. In the ninth, however, New York tied the score as Schmidt lost Doyle's liner, Larry advancing on Lobert's hit, and then, after Lobert had been doubled up with Fletcher, coming in on Robertson's right field hit.

In the tenth it was necessary for the Giants to make two plays to the plate in order to head off runs, a pass and a single making all the trouble, but Lobert and Schauer doing the stop act beautifully.

In the eleventh the Giants looked good again when, with two out, Fletcher doubled and scored on Burns's hit. It wasn't in the cards, however, and Boston went in to hit Schauer for the finish. The score:

VARDON AND RAY NOT COMING

English Golfers Change Plans After Sinking of Lusitania.

MANY STARS AMONG COLLEGE PITCHERS

Neyland of Army, Smith of Columbia, and Deyo of Princeton Show Real Ability.

Not in many years has a college baseball season developed so many pitching stars as this Spring. Already the performances of many college twirlers have attracted much attention, and games with an unusual number of strike outs and a minimum of hits have been frequent.

Some of the present crop of college youngsters have displayed talent which has attracted the attention of many of the major league scouts. To enumerate all the sterling pitching performances of the collegians this season would consume considerable space, but the achievements of just a few of the more prominent college players proves that this is an unusual year for high-class college boxmen.

The pitcher whose work has attracted more attention than any of the others is Robert R. Neyland, Jr., of West Point. He has established a new record of twenty straight voctories, which is one better than the mark of nineteen straight attained only among the major leaguers by Rube Marquard and Pat Keefe, both of the Giants. Neyland's record was not made, however, in one season. His winning streak began away back on May 24, 1913, when he shut out Notre Dame. The last team to defeat Neyland was Fordham on May 17, 1913. And he has been winning ever since.

Last Spring he pitched in nine games and won them all. This year he has won nine straight, beating New York University, Stevens, Rutgers, Lafayette, Harvard, Seton Hall, Lehigh, Georgetown, and Washington and Lee.

Neyland has beaten the navy twice, and expects to do it again when the army plays the navy at West Point on May 29. His best record was made against Colgate last year, when he pitched a no-hit no-run victory, 8 to 0. Only thirty men faced him. Neyland comes from Greenville, Texas, and he was developed at West Point by Sammy Strang, the former Giant, who has been coaching the army team for several seasons. Neyland is a six-footer, and weighs 175 pounds. He is also a star football player and the heavyweight champion boxer of the corps of cadets.

Columbia also has a pitching star in George Smith, who has been mainly responsible for Columbia's fine showing on the diamond this Spring. This year Smith has won four games out of five, among the teams defeated being Williams, one of the best of the season's college teams. Smith is a right-hander. He is a curve-ball pitcher, has a fine change of pace, and a telling crossfire delivery. Against Wesleyan, two weeks ago, Smith struck out seventeen batsmen and allowed only four hits. Smith comes from Port Chester, N. Y., and has been picked as an unusual pitcher by such good judges as Andy Coakley and Jack Chesbro. It is not Smith's intention to go into professional baseball.

Princeton, this season, has the strongest pitching staff in years in Deyo, Link and Chaplin. Deyo last season shut out Yale with three hits. He has been keeping up his fine work this season. He shut out Cornell, 1 to 0, allowing about two hits. Link this season won over Williams, striking out fourteen men. He also defeated Virginia, allowing but one hit, while only twenty-nine men faced him. Chaplin only last week pitched a sensational one-hit game against Lawrenceville, fanning eighteen batsmen.

There are also many other college pitchers who have done splendid work this Spring. Way, of Yale, has shown superior form, and the Blue depends on him for its big games. A youngster named Moore from Bates pitched a fine one-hit game against Harvard. The Crimson also has a good man in Frye, while Young of Williams and Bailey of Holy Cross have done excellent work during the season.

PRINCE HAL'S HUNT CUP.

Society Gets Up Early to See the Maryland Trophy Race.

Special to The New York Times.

BALTIMORE, Md., May 8.—Prince Hal won the second annual Maryland Hunt Cup renewal which was at four miles, for Gresham H. Poe at Pimlico before breakfast this morning. Jervis Spencer, Jr., had the mount and rode Prince cleverly from start to finish.

Mullinahone owned and ridden by Albert G. Ober, Jr., finished second and about fifteen lengths back of the winner. G. Bernard Fenwick piloted Induction into third place, being less than two lengths behind Mullinahone. Kings Lynn, who was coupled with Mullinahone and ridden by B. Blakistone, was fourth, while Whipperpool, with Sidney Waters in the saddle, pulled up after going three and one-half miles.

Several hundred society persons were on hand to see the running of this classic event.

When the horses returned to the judges' stand Mr. Poe, the owner of Prince Hal, and Mr. Spencer, the rider, were presented with two handsome silver cups. In addition, a purse was divided for the first time $300 to the winner, $100 to second and $50 to third.

At the start Induction went to the front. At the end of the second mile Mullinahone went to the front. When the fourth and last mile was started the riders urged their mounts along a trifle faster and, going into the back stretch, less than two lengths separated the first and fourth. At the half-mile post Prince Hal set a fast pace and, entering the home stretch, pulled away without apparent effort. Mullinahone was ridden hard the last furlong to stall off Induction's determined effort, which he did nobly because Induction was made too much use of in the first half of the contest, and had nothing left toward the end.

Prince Hal was sired by Judge Morrow, which won the the Brooklyn Handicap and several other big stakes during his time upon the turf in the nineties. Many of the speculators had picked Prince Hal to win because of his breeding.

Talisman won the first renewal of the race last year, and the time was 8 minutes and 1 second, which is claimed to be a world's record. The official time today was 8 minutes and 3 3-5 seconds. The first mile was traveled in 1 minute and 58 2-5 seconds.

REGRET WINS DERBY.

H. P. Whitney's Filly, First of Her Sex to Capture Kentucky Classic.

LOUISVILLE, Ky., May 8.—Harry Payne Whitney's chestnut filly Regret, ridden by Jockey Notter, won the Kentucky Derby, valued at approximately $15,000, at Churchill Downs here today.

Regret was the first filly ever to score a victory in the forty-one years' history of the stake. She defeated sixteen other starters. Her time for the mile and a quarter was 2:05 2-5. Pebbles was second and Sharpshooter third.

TWO TITLES FOR NEW YORK.

Herbert and Ratner Win Amateur Boxing Honors at Fair.

Two first and three second places were taken by representatives of the Metropolitan Association of the A. A. U. in the finals of the Panama-Pacific Exposition amateur boxing tournament in San Francisco, which were decided Friday night. Matty Herbert of the Union Settlement A. C., 108-pound metropolitan title holder, triumphed in the final of his class over T. Farren of San Francisco, and in the 145-pound division August Ratner of the Ninety-second Street Y. M. H. A. won from A. Askins of Boston in the deciding bout.

Allie Nack, Union Settlement A. C.; A. Kaufman, Trinity Club, and Arthur Sheridan, Trinity Club, are the New York boys who were defeated after reaching the finals. Nack lost to H. Gleason of Seattle in the 135-pound class, Kaufman finished second to G. Meyers of San Francisco in the 158-pound division, and Sheridan was beaten by O. Larue of San Francisco in the heavyweight class.

The A. A. U. report of the bouts, sent by William Spengler, the New York heavyweight, who did not take part in the tournament owing to a broken hand sustained while training, states that Sheridan was in very poor shape, weighing only 164 pounds. When he left New York he tipped the scales at 177 pounds.

In other final bouts T. Maloney of Philadelphia won from B. Baird, Seattle, in the 115-pound class, and J. Morretto, San Francisco, defeated H. Crowley of Boston at 135 pounds.

PRINCETON, N. J., May 8.—Princeton defeated Columbia and Pennsylvania in the Childs Cup regatta race on Lake Carnegie this afternoon. The Tiger crew swept over the finish line a length and a half ahead of Columbia, which beat out Pennsylvania for second place by a remarkable last-minute spurt. The Blue and White eight came up from behind with a rush and, rowing at top speed, went past the Quaker boat, and were gaining rapidly on Princeton when the latter went over the finish line.

Poor judgment on the part of Paddock, the Columbia coxswain, was costly to his crew. Paddock steered his shell so close to the course flag at the half-mile mark that he fouled the flag post. The accident did not mar the easy smoothness of the Columbians' stroke, but it retarded the boat for a fraction of a second, long enough to let Princeton draw away from the New Yorkers. Coach Rice in an interview after the race blamed this occurrence together with his men's poor start for the loss of the race.

Pennsylvania got away to the best start, the Quakers rowing a vigorous thirty-six. Columbia was second, considerably behind Pennsylvania, and Princeton was a poor third. This order remained unchanged up to the half-mile mark, when Columbia's boat ran foul of the course flag. Princeton jumped ahead of the Blue and White oarsmen and started to overhaul Pennsylvania. The Quakers were then rowing thirty-six while Princeton and Columbia were both keeping a steady thirty-four. Nearing the half-mile mark the Tigers lowered their stroke to thirty-two, but there was more power in the Princeton boat, and at the three-quarter mark the Orange and Black shell shot into the lead. A mighty cheer went up from the Princeton undergraduates who lined the banks and it grew in volume as the Tigers increased their advantage.

Princeton was two lengths in the lead as the crews passed the mile and a half mark. Both the Tigers and Columbia were rowing 32, while the Pennsylvanians, who were being hard pressed by the Blue and White boat, had dropped. A mile and three-quarters Columbia raised the stroke to 33, and immediately the New Yorkers started to gain. Princeton was still rowing strongly, and it was apparent that the Tigers could not be beaten.

Another hundred yards and Paddock called for another spurt from Columbia. Myers sent the stroke up to 36, and the Blue and White shell seemed fairly to lift through the water. Pennsylvania raised the stroke to 36, but the fast-flying Columbians were not to be denied, and they steadily cut down the Quakers' advantage.

Fifty yards from the finish line the Columbia shell poked its nose in front of Pennsylvania; from then on the advantage swayed back and forth between the two crews varying with the alternate strokes. Columbia's ten last strokes at the finish, however, gave Rice's men a lead of two feet. Princeton went over the line five and four-fifths seconds ahead of Columbia.

All the crews were fresh at the finish, the Tigers in particular being in excellent condition. No time was taken for the race.

Princeton's freshman crew was beaten by the Pennsylvania freshmen by two lengths. Poor steering by the Princeton coxswain was responsible for the crew's defeat. The Tigers' yearlings led by two lengths at the mile mark, but from there on the boat wandered aimlessly over the course, and they were easily defeated. The Princeton second freshman crew won easily from the Northeast High School of Philadelphia by four lengths.

The three 'Varsity crews were boated as follows:

YALE SOPHS THE WINNERS.

Class Champions Will Row the Harvard Class Victors.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., May 8.—Yale's sophomore crew by defeating the juniors at the annual Spring Regatta, held on Lake Whitney today, won the class championship and will race the winner of the Harvard class series at Cambridge. The sophomores won by a boat length over a one and one-sixth mile course in 6:34.

The race was rowed twice. In the first race the juniors crowded the sophomores so close to the shore that the oarsmen had to stop rowing, so Coach Nickalus ordered the race rowed over.

The first Yale freshman eight defeated the Rockrimmon Boat Club of Springfield, Mass., by five lengths in 6:2[illegible]. The Springfield (Mass.) High School won from the second freshman eight by a scant quarter of a length in 6:32½.

A unique feature was an exhibition race between th first and second 'Varsity eights, the oarsmen wearing high silk hats and false whiskers. The first eight won by an eigth of a length in 6:10.

Fordham Changes Baseball Coach.

The Fordham baseball rooters received a shock yesterday when Jack Warner, the former Giant catcher, who has been coaching the Bronxonians, resigned his position over the Maroon ball tossers just two hours before the game with Columbia at South Field. Although at a loss for a short while, Manager Walter Lynch immediately set to work and signed up Billy Lush to succeed Warner. The new coach had only half an hour to get ready and take over his charges before they started the first game for the new Peizer, with 82—13—69, qualified for the finals to the field just before the game opened and had only a brief chance to see his future charges in practice. Lush is an old hand the coaching game, having had charge of Yale for five years. Last year he assisted Andy Coakley at Columbia, and, strange enough, his first task yesterday was against his former superior.

DODGERS DOWN PHILLIES—HARD HITTERS IN BIG LEAGUES—YALE AND HARVARD VICTORS

COOMBS CONQUERS QUAKER BATSMEN

Old Athletics' Twirler Pitches Great Ball for Dodgers and They Beat Phillies, 3 to 2.

For once Connie Mack's judgment appears to have led him off the wrong trail. He thought Jack Coombs was one of the "has beens" of baseball, and right there is where the Quaker City expert blundered. At the close of the 1911 season, during one of the world's series games, Jack passed out as a winning pitcher. He strained himself then, and until this season the once great pitcher joined the ranks of those who have conquered and then fallen by the wayside. His arm was gone, and he was a baseball relic. Banking on the old adage that a man never comes back, Connie finally disposed of him to Brooklyn. But the old saying for once played tag with Connie, and yesterday Jack Coombs, for the second time this season, passed a defeat to the men who trail Pat Moran around the circuit. In other words, the Dodgers won from Philadelphia by a score of 3 to 2.

If there is any doubt that the great pitcher has, for the present at any rate, proved his worth let it be said right here that there was enough of discouragement in yesterday's two-hour session at Ebbets Field to have brought tears to a less experienced campaigner. And just when everything looked the blackest was when Jack sent the slants across in the most effective manner. The first untoward happening came in the second, and a Brooklyn defeat was just ready to respond to a call from the wings. Wheat had gobbled a liner by Paskert, and then Killifer rolled an invalid down to Schultz. The Dodger third baseman, in the exuberance of his spirits, tossed the ball far over Daubert's head and the runner reached second. Then Rixey popped a lofter behind O'Mara. He ran back for the catch and then let the ball trickle through his hands, and Killifer was on third as a result of the error. Then came a short single past Cutshaw, and the bases were full, with only one out. With this discouraging outlook ... tightened up. Bancroft couldn't ... all past Daubert, and Killifer ... out at the plate. Becker ... out to Daubert unassisted.

... Philadelphia run came as a ... a pass, which Coombs handed ... A single to left by Bancroft ... to second and he reached third ... r's infield out. As it was, the final throw ... wide of the plate. Whitted, ... man, passed the bat ineffect... through the air. In all, Coombs ... pitched for only five hits and for ... than one in any inning.

In the fifth inning that Brooklyn won the game. When Otto Miller drove out a three bagger to right field the big crowd of fans voiced wild approval. Coombs flied out to Bancroft. Mr. Ollie O'Mara then came up and dropped a funny sort of a double just inside the foul line in right field. He couldn't have picked out a better place and Miller strolled home. Robbie put Eddie Zimmerman in to bat for Stengle and he justified the choice by singling to right and scoring O'Mara. The score:

CHAMPION LYON'S BIG DAY.

New York A. C. Trap Shooter Scores at Club's Final Event.

With the exception of the annual championship shoot of the organization that is to be decided next Saturday, the trapshooting season of the New York A. C. came to an end yesterday at Travers Island. The hero of the afternoon was George L. Lyon, who won the championship of America last week. The new champion was in remarkably good form and took the high scratch prize with the remarkable score of 99 out of a possible 100 targets.

The win did a good deal for Champion Lyon. Not only did it give him the high scratch prize yesterday, but it also gave him the prize offered for the best scratch score during the season. Furthermore, it gave him the season's long run prize, he making 72 straight targets without a miss. Prior to the shoot, H. L. Spotts was leading for the prize, with a score of 66. Champion Lyon also was the winner of the Club and the Travers Island Trophies yesterday.

C. J. Stein annexed the last leg on the Monthly Cup. The win gave him the permanent ownership of the trophy. The Accumulation Cup went to R. R. Debacher, and F. Fowler was the high novice gunner. The high handicap prize was won by W. R. Delehanty, and C. W. Billings won the Variety Cup.

Being the final shoot of the year, the prizes were awarded in all of the other events that have been running throughout the season. R. L. Spotts annexed the cup for the gunner who won the most high scratch prize during the Winter. He had captured the event six times. The high handicap prize went to W. R. Delehanty. He took the trophy after a shoot-off against C. J. Stein. Both had won the event four times. The Accumulation Cup went to R. L. Spotts, with four wins, and C. W. Billings won the Variety trophy.

TRAPSHOOTING AT SEA.

Naval Officers Practice en Route to New York for Fleet Review.

U. S. S. SOLACE, AT SEA, May 7.—Trapshooting is as rapidly growing in favor as a sport with naval officers as it is among sportsmen on land. Nearly all battleships carry a trap and a supply of clay "birds," and officers practice when daily drills are over, shooting from the side of the ship. With the vessel under way the sport is attractive, even though the usual sixteen-yard rise cannot be had, as the wind and the motion of the vessel compensate for the lack of distance of rise of the targets.

The Red Cross Gun Club of the Hospital Ship Solace, had a twenty-five-"bird" practice shoot en route to New York today, and the following scores were made: Surgeon Garton, 20; Surgeon Strine, 23; Paymaster Williams, 23; Surgeon Garrison, 15, and Surgeon M. E. Higgins, 22.

The sport is new to most of the club's members, as the club was only organized when the Solace joined the fleet at Guantanamo last February. A three-man team defeated the team from the U. S. S. Florida during the stay in Cuban waters, but only by a close margin. The club challenges any navy team for a match at any time.

Bayside Trap Shooters in Front.

The gunners of the Bayside Yacht Club had no great difficulty in winning the last leg for the Orpheum Trophy yesterday. The cup, which was offered for interclub competition among the yachting organizations of Long Island, has produced good sport. The Bayside nimrods have led since the start, and they did not need to come to the firing line at the Bensonhurst Yacht Club yesterday had they so desired. However, their full shooting team was on hand and took the shoot by a score of 443 out of a possible 500 targets.

The Bensonhurst Yacht Club finished second with a score of 436 targets to its credit. Then came the Port Washington Club with a score of 417 targets. The Jamaica Bay Yacht Club did not qualify. In the same order the four clubs finished the series. In addition to the interclub shoot, the Bensonhurst Yacht Club offered prizes for both scratch and handicap gunners.

Fifty-two gunners reported. The high scratch gunner was J. S. Fosdick, Bayside Yacht Club, who had 93 out of 100 targets. His individual scores were 25, 22, 24, and 22. Six gunners tied for the high handicap prize. They were Van Pelt, Dreyer, D. E. Smith, Smull, Hewens, and Nash. The shoot-off was taken by Van Pelt, with Dreyer second and D. E. Smith third.

BROOKFEDS LISTLESS WITH TARS AT GAME

Benny Kauff with Wardmen Again, but They Lose to Kansas City.

Kansas City won from the Brookfeds at Washington Park yesterday, and, although the Kawfeds were able to get hits when they were needed, the Brookfeds assisted largely in their own defeat by bad base running and poor fielding. Benny Kauff, the contract hurdler, was back in centre field for Brooklyn, and he made two pretty catches. He fanned the first time up, drew a pass on his second trip to the plate, made a scratch hit scoring two runs on his third attempt, and was an easy out on a ground ball to first when he went to the plate the fourth time.

A large number of sailors from the North Atlantic fleet were scattered throughout the stands, and the tars were easily the most enthusiastic rooters at the contest. In their honor a special entrance gate was draped with American flags, and a large flag hung across the front of the stand.

Twice during the game, with one man down and runners on first and second, the Brookfed on second tried to steal third, but was nailed, and a moment later a hit was made in each case, scoring the man from first. Brooklyn, through this kind of base running, was deprived of two runs. Not only was the Brookfed base running poor, but the Ward outfit lacked "pep" in the field, and these conditions, coupled with the ability of the Kawfed batters to nick the ball for a safety when it was needed, proved the undoing of Brooklyn.

In the fourth inning Catcher Easterly of the Kawfeds was banished from the game by Umpire Corcoran for disputing a decision.

In the fourth inning Perring gave the ball a long ride into left field, and it bounded off the top of the fence in front of the centre field bleachers back into the field, and the Kawfed third sacker got around to third base. Perring, by the way, had a perfect batting score yesterday—a triple, two singles, and two sacrifices in five attempts at the bat. Kenworthy, who covers the second station for Kansas City, accepted ten chances, several of which were extremely difficult. The score:

Chifeds Blanked on Tinker Day.

Special to The New York Times.

NEWARK, N. J., May 8.—Newark, with Earl Mosely pitching, hung over a string of zeroes on the Whales today in a 2 to 0 game. It was the first workout for Mosely, who has been afflicted with a sore arm, after a lay-off of nearly a month. It was Tinker day, and Joe was presented with a floral gift by local admirers, but it was a rather sad occasion for Tinker, who limped painfully as he approached the plate before the game to accept the present. Joe admitted that the outlook for his future activity in baseball is none too bright, as he is suffering from a rupture which was aggravated when he came to bat and swung at a wide curve ball here on Friday. In today's game Mosely took McConnell's measure. Mosely had the Whales guessing, and the only member of the opposing club who could touch him was Flack, who made a trio of safeties. A sensational one-handed catch by Wickland of a foul from Laporte's bat was a feature. The score:

HARVARD IN THE TENTH.

Holy Cross Beaten in Pitchers' Battle by Score of 5 to 3.

Special to The New York Times.

WORCESTER, Mass., May 8.—Harvard defeated Holy Cross 5 to 3 in a ten-inning game on Fitton Field today. The victory was an eleventh hour win for the Crimson, errors by Murphy and Long allowing them to tie the score in the ninth, after two men were out. The Cambridge players sewed the contest up in the tenth, Mapan lead off with a triple followed by singles by Nash and Hardwick and a sacrifice by Garnet gave Harvard a two-run lead. Mapan, the Crimson pitcher, had the better of the pitcher's battle after the first inning, when he allowed Holy Cross three runs by uncorking a couple of wild heaves after Garnet and Harte had both miscued. Violet Loses Again to Rutgers.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., May 8.—For the second time this season Rutgers defeated N. Y. U. in baseball, this afternoon's score being 9 to 0. Waterfield, Rutgers' freshman pitcher, was hit hard, but brilliant support by Twing, Durand, Howlett, and Gilliam prevented the New York team from scoring. Hagabloom started in box for N. Y. U., but was relieved after the first inning. Rutgers hit the ball hard throughout. The score:

WRECKING CREWS IN BIG LEAGUES

Famous Combinations of Hitters Recalled—Detroit Leads Now.

Crawford, Cobb and "Peek-a-Boo" Veach, the famous fence-busting crew of the Detroit Tigers, are just tearing things loose in all of the Western ball yards this Spring. If they can maintain the pace all past records will be dimmed, or totally eclipsed. Perhaps the greatest slugging trio the game ever had were Ed. Delehanty, Sam Thompson, and Larry Lajoie. These three were on the line-up of the Philadelphia Nationals from August of 1896 until midsummer of the following season, and generally followed each other on the batting list.

In a game played during the Spring of 1897 between the Giants and the Phillies with the score 7 to 6 in favor of the Giants and the Phillies at the bat in their half of the ninth with two out, the big slugging trio gave an exhibition of how they were in the habit of pulling games out of the fire. "Mush" Delehanty singled, Lajoie singled and Thompson tripled, and the game was over. These three great hitters made about half of the base hits credited to the whole Philadelphia team during the time they were on its line-up.

Since 1907, Crawford and Cobb have formed the nucleus of the fence-busting brigade, using, in different seasons, such swatsmen as Rossman, McIntyre, Veach, and even used little Donnie Buch as the third party one season. During the season of 1909 Cobb, Crawford and Bush made 546 of the 1,355 base hits credited to the whole Detroit team. The best efforts of Crawford, Cobb & Co. were made during 1911, with J. Delehanty as filler in. This great trio made 649 base hits. The total number made by the team stood 1,546. There are just four records in the history of the game which excel the above-mentioned record, and they were all made during the season of 1887, under the four-strike rule.

One of the slugging combinations to make a record was "Tip" O'Neal, Robinson and Charlie Comiskey of the St. Louis Browns. In the season of 1887 these three made 700 hits. The best record ever made in this respect was created by Pete Browning, "Red" Mack and Hub Collins of the old Louisville Club in 1887. They raised the St. Louis combination's mark by twenty points, making 720 hits, which is the record for all time. The old Baltimore team of 1895-6-7 had a great slugging combination in Keeler, Jennings and Kelly. In these three seasons they averaged over 600 hits each season. The great trio of the Philadelphia Nationals from 1891 until 1895 were Delehanty, Thompson and Hamilton, and later Lajoie was added. They were wreckers of ball games, also of the hopes of many hurlers.

New York had three batsmen who made the welkin ring with their terrific batting from 1886 until 1890. The names of Roger Connor, Jim O'Rourke and Mike Tiernan were feared by all hurlers. Less than a dozen seasons ago Mike Donlin, Mertes and Browne were the slugging triplets. Between them they cleaned up 524 hits during the season of 1905. The bunched sluggers on the Giant line-up last season were Becher, Doyle and Burns, with Snodgrass, Fletcher and Merkle on the secondary line of offense. But when the residents of old Manhattan Isle want to take a slant at a real batting combination they have to meander over the bridge and gaze upon Jake Daubert and his able assistants, Wheat and Stengel.

Honus Wagner, Clarke, and Leach were the clean-up crew for Pittsburgh for several seasons, with Beaumont helping out. For a couple of seasons back the Pirates have had no heavy slugging contingents. Cincinnati in the season of 1903 had a squad of heavy swatsmen who were the equal of any in the game that year Mike Donlin, Jake Beckley, and "Cy" Seymour. These three made 517 hits during that season, almost half the total number the entire team made. Cincinnati has been looking around ever since trying to get a trio their equal.

In the American League teams having a battery of heavy artillerists are scarce. The great trio of sluggers who carried the men of Mack on to many victories are scattered. Collins, Baker and McInnis were a much-feared combination, and hurlers had good reasons to quake when facing them. For four seasons this bunch have led all slugging trios in the American, but the Detroit three have held the honor in five different years, Crawford and Cobb always forming the main offensive force. Lajoie and Flick of the Clevelands, with a third party, were a big force in winning games for their team.

NEYLAND'S IN AGAIN.

West Point Pitcher Chalks Up His Twentieth Straight Victory.

Special to The New York Times.

WEST POINT, N. Y., May 8—"Bob" Neyland, the crack army pitcher slipped over his twentieth straight victory today, defeating Washington and Lee, 9 to 5, in a free-hitting game on the plains.

The Army lads pounded Jennings hard throughout, and put the game in their locker in the third. Until then the "Generals" had all kinds of trouble solving Neyland's delivery.

The Cadets' early lead came as a result of the consistent hitting of Gerhardt, Merrillat, Oliphant, Bradley, and Prichard all landing on Jennings in the opener for safe drives. Hits by Britton and Oliphant and Prichard's sacrifice fly gave them two more in the third. This proved to be enough to win, and after that Neyland took things easy.

The Army team now has an even dozen victories to its credit, without any defeats, as its record for this season. The score:

Milburn's Homer Wins for Yale.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., May 8.—Yale's nine won a hard-earned victory over the University of Vermont team here today, 2 to 0. The work of the pitchers, Way for the Blue and Gilbert for the visitors, was effective throughout. From Way Vermont recorded only three scattered hits, while Gilbert allowed Yale only four, neither twirler giving a base on balls. Yale scored its two runs in the sixth. Middlebrook beat out a bunt to first. Milburn, the former Exeter star, drove the ball between right and centre fields for a home run, scoring Middlebrook. In the ninth inning Reilly, Yale's third baseman, badly injured his hand and was replaced by Rhett. The score:

CORNELL BATS DEYO HARD AND WINS

Princeton's Crack Pitcher Gets a Lacing in the Sixth Inning.

Special to The New York Times.

ITHACA, N. Y., May 8.—Cornell pounded out a victory over Princeton this afternoon after the Tigers had taken an early start, the Ithacans winning by the score of 8 to 3. A batting rally in the sixth and seventh innings gave the Ithacans a well-earned triumph. Princeton found Russell for six hits and three runs in the first two and one-third innings, but Steve Regan then went on the slab for the Cornellians, shutting out the Tigers and allowing them only one hit for the balance of the game.

In the sixth inning Clary's three-base hit drove in two runs and hits by Donovan, Mellen, Bills, and Keating, together with Princeton's errors gave the Cornellians three more. In the seventh they got two more on the Princeton errors and Keating's hit. Two double plays, in which Mellen figured largely, and a sensational running catch by Driggs, Regan's liner, which caught Sutterby off second base, were features. The score:

CRESCENTS BEAT CORNELL.

Lacrosse Game Marred by Accidents—Capt. Cyplot of New Mooners Put Out of Play.

Several accidents marred the second period of the annual alcrosse game between the Crescent Athletic Club and Cornell University at Bay Ridge yesterday. The Brooklyn clubmen had no great difficulty in winning by a 7-to-1 score. However, as play drew toward a close, Ted Cyplot of the Bay Ridge twelve received a nasty smash over the head and had to retire.

Captain H. Taylor of Cornell also was hurt and gave up playing. The Crescents were the masters of the colleagues from the opening whistle. They had a comfortable lead of four goals to one at the end of the first period, and added easily to the score in the second period. The line-up:

Cornell.	Position.	Crescents.

Indians Beaten at Lacrosse.

Special to The New York Times.

SOUTH BETHLEHEM, Penn., May 8.—The Carlisle Indians were shut out today by Lehigh in a rough la crosse game, 3 to 0. It was the Indians' first defeat of the season. Carlisle led for the first ten minutes of play, but after that the tide changed under Lehigh's skillful attack and stolid defense. The first-half score was 2 to 0. Chaffing under certain defeat, the Indians roughed it up in the second half, with Lehigh joining in, and the game was called by mutual consent six minutes before actual time was up. Jay added another score in this half on a pretty pass from Kerby.

Jersey Anglers Cared For.

The New Jersey State Fish and Game Commission has recently stocked the Walkill River with rainbow trout. A large consignment of pickerel, black bass, and yellow perch have been taken from the Boonton Reservoir and put into the lake at Weequahic Park. The bass measured about 8 inches and weighed about three pounds, while the pickerel measured from 10 to 16 inches long. The pickerel season opens in New Jersey on May 29. A petition is now in circulation in Newark directed to the Essex County Park Commission for an extension of the fishing hours in conformity with the State law. The anglers want to be allowed to fish from sunrise until 9 o'clock in the evening.

The Assurance in "Certificate No. 15"

This official document of The Automobile Club of America carries the only existing mileage record that can be taken at full face value as indicating the service the heavy-car owner can safely expect. It certifies for the Pennsylvania Oilproof an average official test mileage of 6,760 Miles!

VACUUM CUP TIRES

This mileage applies first to heavy cars, the cars used in the test weighing over 4,000 pounds each. With light cars the mileage assurance increases in proportion to reduction in weight.

Moreover, since this test, two factors have still further contributed to tire economy. First, we have developed and applied a new toughening process which has added 50% wear resistance to our 1915 product. Second, our new schedule makes these the lowest priced of any tires having any kind of non-skid device added to the regular thickness of tread.

The added wear resistance doubles the effective life of the guaranteed anti-skid Vacuum Cups, which have a perfect suction grip on slippery pavements, acting on the only principle by which a rubber projection can grip a smooth, wet surface.

KOLEHMAINEN AGAIN WINS FOOTRACE TO CITY HALL—YALE AND CORNELL ATHLETES TRIUMPH

KOLEHMAINEN WINS EVENING MAIL RACE

Little Finn Shakes Off Gianakopulos When Ready and Wins in a Jog.

For the third time in three successive years Hannes Kolehmainen, aptly termed the "Flying Finn" of the Irish-American A. C., yesterday won the fifth running of The Evening Mail's "modified marathon," contested through the streets of New York from 184th Street and the Grand Concourse to the City Hall. Nick Gianakopulos, the big Greek athlete of the Millrose A. A., was the nearest rival to Kolehmainen as the Finn sprinted across the finish line amid the plaudits of almost 20,000 persons, and back of Gianakopulos was Fred Travelena of the Mohawk A. C. Almost a third of a mile was the margin by which Kolehmainen triumphed, and a like distance separated Gianakopulos from Travelena.

It is estimated that more than a million persons lined the course, which measures approximately thirteen miles, and a good portion of this number was crowded into the lower downtown streets, where a cordon of automobiles literally had to plow a path through which Kolehmainen could pass. Police arrangements for the race could not have been better, being directly handled by Commissioner Arthur Woods, but the narrowness of some of the downtown thoroughfares was responsible for the congested conditions.

About 1,200 athletes of all descriptions and abilities were lined up at 184th Street and Grand Concourse when Supreme Court Justice Bartow S. Weeks fired the starting gun, but not more than three-quarters of that immense field went the full route.

Kolehmainen's time of 1:14:09 3-5 fell more than five minutes behind his record performance of last year, but was very good considering the humidity and heat of the day. Many of the less trained athletes collapsed during the race and had to be attended by physicians stationed along the route of the contest. None of the lads needed serious treatment.

What the spectators thought of Kolehmainen's ability was well exemplified when they queried the standing of the leaders. No one asked "Who's first?" but everybody wanted to know who was second. And throughout the entire race the same answer had to be given.

The "Flying Finn" went out in front almost with the crack of the gun, and at his shoulder was Gianakopulos, who remained there for almost seven miles. At no time in the early stages of the race could Kolehmainen get more than three yards away from the sturdy Greek, but after passing the eighth mile Gianakopulos tired and the task of the Finlander became lighter. When he was aware he had Nick beaten Kolehmainen took things easier, and that, too, is responsible in a measure for the slow time.

The fight for third place was one of the real features of the race. Hugh Honohan of the New York A. C. held this position for the biggest part of the distance, but in the closing stages he was passed by both Travelena and Charles Pores of the Millrose A. A., who gained athletic recognition through his victory in the Brooklyn to Sea Gate marathon.

Acting Mayor McAneny, Rear Admiral Fletcher and his staff of the Atlantic Fleet, which arrived here yesterday, waited at City Hall some time to see the finish, but left before Kolehmainen bounded past the judges.

The winner's time at points designated as mile posts was: First mile, 4:39; second, 10:31 3-5; third, 15:53 3-5; fourth, 21:05; fifth, 26:38; sixth, 32:11; seventh, 38:07 1-5; eighth, 43:56; ninth, 49:45 3-5; tenth, 55:34; eleventh, 1:01:18 3-5; twelfth, 1:07:38 1-5; thirteenth, 1:13:24 4-5, and the finish, 1:14:09 3-5.

The course led from 184th Street and the Concourse down to 167th Street, where a sharp turn took the runners into Jerome Avenue, continuing along that wide thoroughfare to Central Bridge, crossing the Harlem River. The route then was down to 158d Street, where a turn was made into Seventh Avenue, to 110th Street, then east and along Fifth Avenue. At Fifty-seventh Street the next turn wsa made to Seventh Avenue, thence to Fourteenth Street, east to Fifth Avenue again, to Washington Arch. After passing that arch the line of running was to West Fourth Street, to Lafayette Street to Elm Street and into the City Hall Plaza. The most difficulty was encountered by the runners on Fourth Street and Elm Street.

Though no official anouncement could be made last night because of the difficult task of checking the men who finished, the Mohawk A. C. probably will win the team trophy. Representatives of this club finished third, sixth, ninth, nineteenth, and twenty-third. Summary of the first fifty runners to finish:

MAKES BROAD JUMP RECORD

Worthington of Dartmouth Does 23 Ft. 2 In.—Team Loses to Penn.

HANOVER, N. H., May 8.—The track and field athletes of the University of Pennsylvania defeated Dartmouth in their third annual track meet here today by a score of 64½ to 52½. All the events were closely contested, and out of thirteen numbers Penn got first place in seven, while Dartmouth took first in six.

Pennsylvania was unusually strong in the sprints, and Paterson of the Quakers was first in the 100-yard and 220-yard dashes, his team mates also finishing in second and third places in both events. It was Dartmouth's failure to score a place in the sprints which put the Green out of the running. Ted Meredith of Penn won the 440-yard run, finishing ahead of Riley of Dartmouth in the good time of 49 3-5. Meredith also won the 880-yard run in 1:58.

The one-mile run was won by Tucker of Dartmouth, with Peeso of Penn second and Granger of Dartmouth third. Dartmouth took all three places in the shot-put and the broad jump.

In the later event Worthington of Dartmouth jumped 23 feet 2 inches, establishing a new college record. Larry Whitney won the shot-put, with Spears of Dartmouth second and Smith of Dartmouth third.

WILLIAMS DOWNS AMHERST.

Annual Meet Goes to "Purple" by the Score of 71 1-6 to 54 5-6.

Special to The New York Times.

WILLIAMSTOWN, Mass., May 8.—Williams defeated Amherst here today in the annual dual track and field meet between the two old rivals, 71 1-6 to 54 5-6. Hindered by a heavy track and a ten-minute downpour in the middle of the meet the times were on the whole slow. The events, however, were with slight exception closely contested. General scoring ability in all the events, a clean sweep in the 220 and 8½ points in the pole vault accounted for the Purple's victory. At the end of four events the score was tied 18-18, and at the eleventh event Williams had a meague advantage at 52 2-3 to 46 1-3. From then on the home team drew ahead. The two-mile furnished the most exciting race of the day. Shriver of Wiliams went out in front at the start and opened up a twenty-yard lead, but after a lap and a half Welles of Amherst drew up to even terms. It was nip and tuck until the last half lap, when the Williams cross-country champion let out a beautiful sprint and came down the home stretch a winner by twenty yards.

Fordham Crew to Get Action.

Following the decision not to let the Fordham freshman crew go to New Haven to compete against the Yale first year boat yesterday Manager McCormack has entered into negotiations to have the Maroon and Blue freshmen race on May 22. This course would give Fordham's freshmen a chance to get into shape and also to send their shell to New Haven. If these negotiations go through the Fordham freshies will race the Yale and Columbia first year boats in the same week in their first year of existence. Coach Rice of Columbia says the two crews will compete in the Decoration Day regatta. Last week the Fordham "Prep" and freshman crews had several time trials and although the speed shown was nothing to boast of the Maroon coach is looking for considerable improvement.

CORNELL ATHLETES TAKE HARVARD MEET

Ithacans Win After a Close Struggle by the Score of 59 1-3 to 57 2-3.

BOSTON, May 8.—Harvard and Cornell fought right down to the final event in their annual dual track and field meeting in the Stadium this afternoon, the Ithacans winning finally 59 1-3 points to 57 2-3, but only by getting a man into a triple tie for second place in the final event of the program, the pole vault. Harvard needed all the points in this event in order to win, but after J. B. Camp of Harvard had won first place at 12 feet 3⅝ inches, A. L. Milton of Cornell forced himself into a tie with Greeley and Haydock of Harvard, each man clearing 12 feet, and each, therefore, drawing 1 1-3 points in the score. These points of Milton's were the ones, therefore, which won for Cornell.

The Ithacans found Harvard much stronger in several events than expected. In the half mile Speiden was beaten by Bill Bingham in 1:56 1-5, and in the two-mile run Potter was beaten by 60 yards by C. Southworth of Harvard, who was indeed a dark horse, Southworth's time being 9:33 1-5. Both he and Bingham made dual games records. Also in the quarter W. Willcox of Harvard won a great race in 0:48 3-5, while in the mile run Windnagle clipped another old dual record, his time being 4:22 4-5.

Richards of Cornell won three events and 15 points for his team, taking the high and broad jumps and the shot put. In the high jump Richards's 6 feet ⅛ inch was a record, while in the hammer McCutcheon, also of Cornell, set a new games mark of 154 feet 3¼ inches. Bingham ran a wonderful race against Speiden in the half mile, the Cornellian leading by 15 yards around the final turn, but Bingham overhauled him and won by an inch and a half.

Teschner, the Harvard sprinter, failed to come through today, being beaten in 10 seconds flat in the 100 by Ingersoll of Cornell and by Foley of Harvard in the furlong in 0:21 4-5. The hurdling was none too good. Summary:

Mile Run.—Won by L. V. Windnagle, Cornell; W. W. Kent, Harvard, second; J. S. Hoffmare, Cornell, third. Time—4:22 4-5.

Lafayette Loses First Dual Meet.

Special to The New York Times.

EASTON, Penn., May 8.—Lafayette had the first dual track meet of the season on March Field this afternoon and lost it to Swarthmore by the score of 60½ to 51½. The meet was close and exceedingly interesting. The result was not decided until the last event, when the situation was that whichever team should win first place in the broad jump would win the meet. Many of the events were run exceptionally well. In the 220-yard race Brechtell of Lafayette beat Blackwell of Swarthmore by the merst margin imaginable. Brechtell also ran a pretty race in the quarter. The prettiest race of the afternoon was performed by Maxwell in the low hurdles. Gowdy and Hunter were Swarthmore's most substantial point winners. Lafayette was deprived of the services of Captain Boyce, who is sick.

Wesleyan Wins Track Meet.

MIDDLETOWN, Conn., May 8.—Wesleyan won the annual dual track meet with Trinity here today, 83 to 43. One college record was broken, Captain Cashman of Wesleyan, going the two miles in 9:53 4-5. The previous record was 10:04, held by Cashman.

COLUMBIA ATHLETES FIRST.

New York Lads Beat Brown in Dual Meet, 70 to 56.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., May 8.—Columbia defeated Brown here this afternoon 70 to 56 in a dual meet, portions of which were hotly contested and in which Russell C. Beatty, of Columbia, and Joe Halloran, of Brown, divided the individual honors. Each man made 11 points for his team.

Columbia got away with 10 first places in the various events and of these Beatty won the shot put and discus throw and was third in the hammer throw. Halloran won the quarter mile run and was second in the 100 yard dash and the 220 yard dash.

In the quarter mile, Halloran barely beat Captain Larry Hall, of Brown. This was one of the best races of the day, Hall barely nosing out Fred Whelan, of Columbia.

There was a stiff breeze across the field and a track heavy from the rain of the night and early forenoon made the going slow for the athletes.

The half mile run proved to be the hair raising event of the meet, S. Whelan, of Columbia, and Al Koop, of Brown, fighting it out from start to finish. Koop made the pace and kept the lead until almost at the wire. In the last ten yards Whalen let out an extra spurt and passed the Brown man, winning by a scant margin.

The high jump produced an interesting situation, three men tying for first place at 5 feet 7¼ inches. Loescher, of Columbia, and White and Chaplin, of Brown, getting the same mark. The points in this event were divided, but on the jump off Loescher won the medal.

The mile run furnished another good race, Koop, of Brown, running strong all the way. The five entrants were bunched from the start until nearly to the finish, Koop winning by a narrow margin with Gertz, of Columbia, a close second.

FIELD DAY AT BARNARD.

Tennis Finals Won by Helen Gilleaudeau, the Champion.

Barnard College held its annual Field Day yesterday afternoon on Milbank Quadrangle.

With all Columbia leaning out of the windows across the way and an enthusiastic and admiring crowd of parents and proud relatives, the young women athletes showed their powers of endurance in racing, jumping, putting the shot, and other sports.

The feature of the day was the tennis match between Helen Gilleaudeau, 1915, who has held the championship ever since her freshman year, and Constance Mordecai, 1916, which was won by the former.

Marjorie Hellas received the gold medal for winning the greatest number of first places. Among those receiving bronze medals were M. Hellas, R. Jensen, E. Haring, J. Dixon, D. Keck, and M. King. C. Hausle and D. Keck each received a silver medal for tying in second place.

The sophomore class won the point banner with a score of 42.

N. Y. U. Athletes Lose to Rutgers.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., May 8.—Rutgers won easily the track meet with New York University today by the score of 72 to 40. Bowles of Rutgers won the 100-yard dash in ten seconds, equaling the college record. Talman of Rutgers broke his shot-put record with a toss of 41 feet 8½ inches and Coleman broke Rutgers' record in the quarter mile, the new mark being 51 4-5 seconds. New York won both long distance runs. Lent, New York University's star half miler was sick and unable to compete, and Wittyen of Rutgers won easily over McDowell, New York University. Summary:

100-Yard Dash.—Won by Bowles, Rutgers; Crowther, N. Y. U., second. Time—0:10.

220-Yard Dash.—Won by Crowther, N. Y. U.; Reed, Rutgers, second. Time—0:23 2-5.

YALE'S ATHLETES WIN AT PRINCETON

Eli Sprinters Nearly Make Clean Sweep in Dashes in Dual Meet.

Special to The New York Times.

PRINCETON, N. J., May 8.—Yale won the annual dual track meet with Princeton today by a score of 62 to 42. The Elis had a more evenly balanced team and, securing an early lead, kept the advantage to the end. The Tigers excelled in individual performances, Captain Mackenzie establishing a Princeton record of 4:30 for the mile and Stewart equaling the Princeton mark of 0:24 4-5 for the 220-yard low hurdles.

Yale was strong in the sprints and took all but a single place in the 100 and 220 yard events. Moore was the lone Tiger to secure a point, running third in the 220-yard dash. He gave Cornell and Treadway a hard fight, but his efforts in the quarter-mile had tired him, and he was unable to meet the Yale men's final sprint. Moore had a neck-and-neck tussle in the quarter with Val Wilkie of Yale. The Eli runner was a bit stronger in the final dash to the tape and finished five yards in the lead.

Hayes of Princeton ran the prettiest race of the day in the half-mile. He stayed behind Loveman of Yale until half way around the last lap. Then the Tiger cut loose a sprint that the Yale man was unable to meet. Loveman's attempt to keep even with Hayes overtaxed his endurance, and he was beaten out for second place in the last hundred yards by Cooley of Princeton.

An accident to George M. Church, Princeton's best entry in the high hurdles, probably cost the Tigers a first place in the event. Church was leading in his heat when he stumbled as he was about to take a hurdle and was beaten out by three Yale men. Captain Shedden of Yale won the final heat, closely pressed by Stewart of Princeton.

Yale took all three places in the two-mile run and the high jump, as well as in the hundred. Overton, the winner in the two-mile, ran as he pleased from the start and could have done much better than the time he required, 9:44 4-5. The summary:

Two-Mile Run.—Won by Overton, Yale; second, Holden, Yale; third, Frost, Yale. Time—9:44 4-5.

Shot-Put.—Won by Longstreth, Princeton; second, Clendenning, Yale; third, Heyniger, Princeton. Distance—41 feet ⅝ inch.

High Jump.—Won by Oler, Yale; second, Davy, Princeton; Potter, Story, and Grant, Yale, tied for third. Height—6 feet.

Half-Mile.—Won by Hayes, Princeton; second, Cooley, Princeton; third, Loveman, Yale. Time—1:55 3-5.

Broad Jump.—Won by Oler, Yale; second, tie between Hampton and Matthews, Yale. Distance—22 feet 4¾ inches.

220-Yard Hurdles.—Won by Stewart, Princeton; second, Sheddon, Yale; third, Crawford, Princeton. Time—0:24 4-5.

Mile Run.—Won by Mackenzie, Princeton; second, Athe, Princeton; third, Poucher, Yale. Time—4:30. Breaks Princeton's record by one and three-fifths seconds.

440-Yard Run.—Won by Wilkie, Yale; second, Moore, Princeton; third, Richardson, Princeton. Time—0:49 1-5.

120-Yard Hurdles.—Won by Sheddon, Yale; second, Stewart, Princeton; third, Frederick, Princeton. Time—0:16 1-5.

100-Yard Dash.—Won by Treadway, Yale; second, Ricketts, Yale; third, Stewart, Yale. Time—0:10 2-5.

220-Yard Dash.—Won by Treadway, Yale; second, Cornell, Yale; third, Moore, Princeton. Time—0:22 1-5.

Pole Vault.—Tie between Carter, Yale; Johnson, Yale; Baker, Princeton, and Cary, Princeton. Height—11 feet 9 inches.

Hammer Throw.—Won by Lougbridge, Yale; second, Nourse, Princeton; third, Gennert, Princeton. Distance—149 feet 8¾ inches.

880-Yard Run—Won by Hayes, Princeton; second, Cooley, Princeton; third, Loveman, Yale. Time—1:55 3-5.

New York Elks Billiard Victors.

Under the guidance of Rudolph P. Domschke, the New York Inter-Elk Pocket Billiard team, composed of Fred Unger of Montclair and Thomas F. Plunkitt of Brooklyn, last week invaded Chester, Pa., to play the Chester team in the regularly scheduled inter-city pocket billiard match. Two contests were held, the New Yorkers coming off victorious in both instances. In the first game Unger defeated Charles A. Bennett of Chester in one of the most exciting struggles played since the league has been organized. The Pennsylvanian virtually had the game won, when Unger made a sensational stroke and won out by one point. The score was 150 to 149. Plunkitt's victory was comparatively easy, as he defeated his opponent, John A. Malloy, by 150 to 89.

By winning these two games, the series is now tied, necessitating a play off at either Philadelphia or Norristown Elks Club, which it is more than likely will be staged on a Sunday, to give those in attendance an opportunity to visit Atlantic City in the afternoon as the guests of the seashore lodge. Fifty members of the New York lodge went with their team to Chester, and the trip was voted one of the most enjoyable of the season.

POLY PREP BOYS BEST.

Brooklyn School Wins Horace Mann School Track Meet.

Athletes from Polytechnic Preparatory School of Brooklyn carried off the honors at the first annual interscholastic track and field meet of the Horace Mann School at Alumni Field, 234th Street and Broadway.

The point score was, Poly Prep, 91; Horace Mann, 62; St. Paul's, Garden City, 24. The other schools which competed were Holbrook, Trinity, Ethical Culture, and Hamilton. B. Levinson of Poly Prep was the hero, as he took three firsts—the 100-yard senior dash, 220-yard dash, and the running broad jump. He was also on the winning relay team, his school easily taking this race.

A. Kieser, St. Paul's, with a splendid burst of speed in the last hundred, captured the 600-yard race in the fast time of 1:20 2-5; J. Hamilton of Poly Prep was a close second.

The 880-yard senior run went to Holbrook School when F. Stewart just nosed out V. Raymond of Poly Prep in a gruelling and exciting race. It was nip and tuck for the first quarter of a mile, between these two boys, and most of the time they were running abreast. Stewart shot ahead fifty feet before they came to the tape, but Hamilton hung on and was only beaten by a yard at the finish.

George Bronder, Poly Prep, the national javelin champion, easily captured the 12-pound shot put, and also won the discus throw. In the pole vault the same school took all eleven points. The event was won by R. MacDonald at 10 feet 3 inches, J. Brotherhood, M. Page, and V. Newton, from the same institution, all tying for second place at 10 feet

Yale Freshmen Best Princeton.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., May 8.—Yale freshman track athletes swamped the Princeton youngsters here today by the score 69½ to 34½ points. The Eli lads captured nine firsts, eight seconds, and tied for second in the hammer throw. Captain Farwell of the Blue and Gurney were easily the stars of the meet. Farwell won both the hurdle races in fast time, and Gurney captured both the sprints.

In the quarter-mile and high jump Yale took all three places. In the 440 run Orr, Walker, and Williams, all formerly of Exeter, won first, second, and third places, respectively. Orr made the distance in the fast time of 49 4-5 seconds.

The mile event was the most closely contested and was a spectacular race. Underwood of Princeton and Rolf of Yale ran close until a few yards from the finish, when Underwood beat Rolf to the tape by three feet. In the broad jump Clark of Yale won, making 21 feet.

Princeton was strongest in the half-mile run, the pole vault, and the shot put, taking first place in each of these events. Becker of Princeton ran a fine race in the 880, winning over Whittemore of Yale in 2:00 1-5.

DUAL TENNIS MATCHES.

Special to The New York Times.

PRINCETON, N. J., May 8.—Princeton's tennis team defeated Pennsylvania 5 matches to 1 here this afternoon. The feature of the match was the defeat of Captain Church of Princeton by Davis of Pennsylvania in the singles. Church, fresh from running in the Yale-Princeton track meet, was too tired to play his best game, and was a rather easy victim for Davis's steady, consistent playing. Church came back in the doubles and, paired with Kidder, won from Davis and Rowland in straight sets. The summary:

Singles.—Davis (Penn.) defeated Church, (Princeton,) 6—4, 6—3; Kidder (Princeton) defeated Rowland, (Penn.,) 6—4, 8—6; Vandeventer (Princeton) defeated Disston, (Penn.,) 6—3, 6—4; Coffey (Princeton) defeated Replogle, (Penn.,) 6—2, 6—3.

Doubles.—Church and Kidder (Princeton) defeated Davis and Rowland, (Penn.,) 6—4, 6—0; Cooper and Vandeventer (Princeton) defeated Disston and Replogle, (Penn.,) 7—5, 6—1.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., May 8.—Harvard's undefeated tennis team won all nine matches from Dartmouth today. R. Norris Williams, 2d, the national lawn tennis champion in singles, dropped only two games in his match with T. C. Pray of Dartmouth.

AMHERST, Mass., May 8.—Cornell tennis players defeated Amherst both in singles and doubles today.

Tie in Interscholastic Meet.

Englewood High School and Passaic High School tied with 300 points each for honors in the northern New Jersey interscholastic meet at Hackensack yesterday afternoon, given under the auspices of the Princeton Alumni Association. Several new records were made.

H. Rundell of Passaic did 20 feet 5⅝ inches in the broad jump. The former record was 19 feet 8 inches. Roberts of Englewood did 5 feet 8¾ inches in the senior high jump against the old mark of 5 feet 5 inches. Brown of Englewood covered the 300-yard run in 0:37 4-5, as against the old time of 0:38 2-5. V. Woodruff of Nutley, who won three firsts, reduced the mile run record from 4:51 3-5 to 4:50.

AMATEUR RACING AT WHEATLEY HILLS—WOMAN'S METROPOLITAN HANDICAP GOLF LIST—TENNIS

MPERS ENTERTAIN AT MEADOW BROOK

ver Performances by Steeplechasers at H. P. Whitney Farm Unmarred by Falls.

For a time yesterday there was some doubt as to whether the races of the Meadow Brook Steeplechase Association would be run over the course which had been laid out on the farm of Harry Payne Whitney at Wheatley Hills, L. I. Mr. Whitney had gone to Louisville, Ky., to see his filly Regret run for the famous Kentucky Derby, and the Stewards of the association hesitated about running the races when it seemed probable that Mr. Whitney's brother-in-law, Alfred G. Vanderbilt, was among the ill-fated passengers of the Lusitania. But when word was received from an unidentified source that Mr. Vanderbilt had been saved it was decided to go ahead with the day's sport as outlined.

A perfect racing day it was, and this brought out an even larger assemblage than was in attendance a year ago when the Meadow Brook races were run over the Whitney farm for the first time, and when Mr. Whitney had open house for all the countryside and entertained every one who wished to visit the grounds and enjoy the sport. The four-in-hand turnouts were missing from the grounds this year, but the number of equestrians and equestriennes, the latter with straw hats, was greater, and gave a picturesque note to the grounds, fringed with automobiles, dotted with cherry and apple trees in full bloom, and gay with the Spring costumes of women from near-by country places.

It was a day marked by clever performances by the steeplechasers, who are this year to play a more important part than they have in a decade in racing contests. Only one of the starters fell, and that was a stumble rather than a fall, for James Park, who was riding the horse Gus Helm when he made his blunder, caught him, remounted, and finished in the race none the worse.

What was expected to be the principal event of the meeting, the run of three and a half miles for the Meadow Brook Hunt Cup, was restricted to a struggle between three starters, the other nine, which included Foxhall Keene's Toreador, winner of the Rockaway Cup a week ago, declining to accept the issue against J. A. Devereaux's Conqueror, which had been brought up from Philadelphia specially to win the cup. Conqueror did all that was expected of him, with his owner in the saddle, and won in the most impressive fashion from Whitney Kernochan's Nina, the latter tiring under the pace which Conqueror set. It was plain that Conqueror was so completely in a class by himself that he could have won by any distance his very skillful rider wished. Conqueror made his own pace, and loped along over the hills and through the valleys as if the race for the cup was only a holiday for him. Gus Helm, the other starter, was never in the hunt at all, as the two competitors so hot-footed it as to make it impossible for him to keep company.

The Elephant and Adventuress made the prettiest race of the day in the run of two miles over brush for the Stewards' Handicap. They seesawed in the lead all through the running, with Adventuress having a bit the best of it most of the time, though H. Tucker, who rode her, was not able to keep her from going wide at the jumps. That Chandler, a professional jockey, ... to save considerable ground. He took advantage of the opportunity, eased ... count whenever Adventuress ran and so had enough left to catch her when she led over the last obstacle and started up the hill for the finish.

There was a hurrah sort of finish, and the result might have been different had Tucker turned in his saddle to see where the Elephant was. He found out when Chandler stole up on the inside of the track and literally snatched victory from defeat by catching the mare and beating her home by a head right on the finishing line. It was a very clever and exhilarating bit of horsemanship.

In the race for the Rats' Cup, a run of two miles and a half, James Park, riding his own horse, Duke of Duluth, had a pretty tussle with F. Ambrose Clark, riding his good jumper, Knight of Merci. The natural order of precedence, a Duke before a Knight, was maintained through most of the journey, Web Carter alone of the starters being able to get into the head of the procession at any part of the journey. The Duke retained his supremacy through the last mile and, well in hand, won by three lengths at the end.

Cloud, which won the Richard Peters Challenge Cup last year, came back again this year, beating Zellwood out in a pretty finish at the end of a run at a mile and a half, after both had disposed of Sandow, which was some horse yesterday, and leader at the end of a mile and a quarter. He could not hold out for the final quarter, however, and so his colors were lowered to Cloud.

Culvert, which semes to have a monopoly of the dash races, won the five-furlong sprint, by coming away from Mr. Specs so fast in the last furlong as to make the latter look as if he were a cart horse. Summaries:

BOWMAN TENNIS CHAMPION.

Junior Title Holder Captures Westchester Interscholastic Final.

Herbert L. Bowman, Mount Vernon High School, won the interscholastic tennis championship of Westchester County yesterday on the courts of the New York Lawn Tennis Club, at Columbia Oval, Williamsbridge, defeating in the final W. B. May, Jr., Holbrook School, in straight seats, at 6—3, 6—2, 6—1. Both Bowman and May will play in the Yale interscholastic championship at New Haven the latter part of the month.

The victory of Bowman, who won the metropolitan junior championship at Forest Hills last Fall, was expected, as the Mount Vernon youngster showed to advantage over the other contestants. In the semi-final Bowman won from J. T. Kammerer, Pleasantville High School, while May qualified for the final round by a straight victory over Francis Smith, who is Bowman's teammate. May, who is a peculiar player, holds the racquet with both hands, but Bowman, by playing his shots to the right side of the court, made it almost impossible for his opponents to return them. The summary:

Westchester County Interscholastic Tennis Championship.—Third Round—W. B. May, Jr., Holbrook School, defeated R. G. Skinner, Peekskill Military Academy, 6—3, 6—3.
Semi-Final Round—W. B. May, Jr., Holbrook School, defeated Francis Smith, Mount Vernon High School, 6—0, 6—3; Herbert L. Bowman, Mount Vernon High School, defeated J. T. Kammerer, Pleasantville High School, 6—3, 8—3.
Final Round—Herbert L. Bowman, Jr., Mount Vernon High School, defeated W. B. May, Jr., Holbrook School, 6J3, 6J2, 6—1.

Women's Tennis Tomorrow.

Several of the holders of national championships and others who have won the titles in other days appear in the list of competitors for the Women's Metropolitan championship tournament, which will begin tomorrow morning on the courts of the West Side Tennis Club, at Forest Hills, L. I. The interest chiefly centres upon Miss Molla Bjurstedt, the Norwegian player, whose progress through the national indoor tournament to victory was somewhat sensational. Miss Bjurstedt's best weapon, her powerful forehand shot, is certain to be tested to the limit in this meeting, for among the more than forty competitors entered are the leading racquet wielders in this section of the country. The doubles, which will start on Tuesday, and the mixed doubles, scheduled to begin Wednesday, promise sport above the average. Miss Bjurstedt and Miss Ballin will pair. Miss Wagner is to team with Mrs. Theodore Casebeer and Mrs. McLean with Mrs. Wallach. In the mixed doubles Miss Sheafer is to have Edward H. Whitney as her partner and Miss Bjurstedt pairs with Watson M. Washburn. The appointment of Mrs. Frederick Schmitz as referee is a guarantee of the systematic running off of the matches.

MISS HYDE HEADS METROPOLITAN LIST

Over Five Hundred Women Handicapped This Year—Miss Hollins at "1."

Radical alterations have been made in the 1915 handicap list of the Women's Metropolitan Golf Association, announced yesterday afternoon by Mrs. Francis E. Donohoe, of the Montclair Golf Club. Last year Miss Marion Hollins, then the metropolitan champion, was placed alone at plus one and Miss Lillian B. Hyde at scratch.

Since then, however, Miss Hyde has won the title and as a result her name appears alone at the head of the list in a scratch position, while Miss Hollins shares a place at handicap 1, with Miss Georgianna M. Bishop of Brooklawn.

Mrs. N. Pendleton Rogers of Baltusrol and Plainfield, who was given one stroke last year, but who did not play to any extent, is treated more liberally and placed at two. Mrs. H. R. Stockton of Plainfield is advanced from three to two, a consideration also given to Mrs. W. J. Faith of Wykagyl.

Best ball foursomes were in order at the Essex County Country Club yesterday, the club rule that scores of 72 or under shall count as 72 causing a tie for first place between O. M. Weston and H. E. Pratt, with 78-10-68, and P. K. Whelan and E. H. Telzer, with 82-13-69.

Members of the Scarsdale Golf and Country Club took part in sweepstakes in two classes yesterday, the winner in Class A being Joseph Pickhardt, Jr., with 83-7-76. Harry Chalmers captured the prize in the second division, returning a card of 86-16-70.

Members of the North Jersey Country Club took part in the first round of match play for the May Cup. There also was a bogey competition, in which William F. Wund finished 4 up in Class A, while L. G. Beaumont captured the prize in the second class by finishing 3 up.

Golfing members of the Ardsley Club took part in their annual team match yesterday, the Bunker Dodgers, headed by Anson F. Robinson, playing against the Brook Jumpers under the captaincy of Townsend Horner. The Jumpers won, 24 to 18.

As in the past, the Nassau system of scoring was used, but stymies were eliminated, which permitted the participants to take part in the eighteen-hole medal play handicap also on the card. Carman Messmore was the winner of the handicap with a card of 80—11—69. There also was a putting match, in which the successful man was Townsend Horner, who won with 35 putts.

Following the day on the links, the losing team entertained the winner at a beefsteak dinner in the clubhouse, and the prizes were distributed by Robinson, the toastmaster. The winner of each individual match was presented with an Ardsley Club bronze medal.

AGITATION FOR NEW CREW COURSE GROWS

Pelham Bay Only Suitable Waters Available for New York Oarsmen.

Agitation for a permanent rowing course in New York City has reached a place at last where definite action will soon be taken, one way or another. The question has frequently been brought up before, but the supporters were as badly scattered as the opponents and nothing was accomplished. At one time, it went as far as a public hearing before the Board of Estimate, but there were not more than a score of suppliants present, and the proposition was dropped.

Last year there was a concerted movement started. Three rowing associations—the Hudson River, Harlem, and Long Island—consolidated. Their main purpose in so doing was to better the scattered interests, and especially to make progress toward a permanent rowing course. Especial emphasis was placed upon the desirability of a permanent course.

The history of almost any rowing club that has been in existence for a quarter of a century is interesting. Waverly, for instance, now located at the foot of 167th Street, has had to move eight times since it was organized, in 1859. Richard Sturcke, President of the New York Rowing Association, declared at the organization meeting for a permanent course last Monday night that his club had been kept poor largely through repeated moves from places leased from the city.

Sentiment at the meeting of a committee of thirty appointed by President Sturcke was undivided that there must be a move from Harlem. Although all the committee was not present, President Sturcke had letters from all except four favoring the movement sponsored by the association. All those present agreed that the President voiced the proper sentiment when he said that the purpose was to "make haste slowly—but make haste." The Atlantic Division of the American Canoe Association, represented by its Purser, Clemens Schroeder, placed itself on record as in favor of Pelham, and joined forces with the New York Rowing Association.

The possibly available alternatives for a new course seem to be: Newark, the east or west shore of the Hudson above Fort Washington Point, and Pelham Bay. Newark was dismissed at the organization meeting as being out of the Manhattan district; the east shore of the Hudson was declared under control of the New York Central at any time it chooses to erect bulkheads there, and the west shore, where the Columbia crew rows, and where the American Canoe Association has held its meets, was reported by Mr. Schroeder as out of the question. Representing the Hiawatha Canoe Club, which lost its clubhouse in a wind storm last Winter, Mr. Schroeder had approached the Interstate Park Commission for permission to build along the Palisades and had been told that it would not be considered, nor would a single large clubhouse for many clubs be allowed.

This process of elimination left only Pelham. The objections which have been raised to Pelham Park course have always been that those clubs now housed permanently on the Harlem would be put to too great expense in moving, and that the time in transit was too great.

In the first place, Pelham would be a permanent course. It is entirely within the property of the park owned by the city, and it will, therefore, never be sold, traded or otherwise used for new purposes. There is room for a mile and a quarter course, which Mr. Sturcke declares could be made better than Philadelphia's, which is now generally acknowledged as the most satisfactory in the country. It is close to golf, tennis and baseball accommodations arranged by the Park Commission, and it has no sewage and no commerce to interfere with the rowing. If the city's permission can be obtained, the course can be completed for not more than $200,000. The rowing clubs represented by the Permanent Rowing Course Committee have 100,000 voters, according to an estimate made by Chairman Sturcke.

Just what steps will be taken has not yet been decided, but Olin J. Stephens, the permanent Chairman, sent a letter to last Monday's meeting suggesting that the matter be taken up through the Mayor and the Board of Estimate, followed by a public hearing. James Miller of the New York A. C. advocated a trip to be made by the Board of Estimate, the Mayor, and perhaps the park officials, piloted by the committee, to the present course and to the Pelham one. Mr. Miller said that the Subway planned for the district would have a station at Westchester Street, not ten minutes from the proposed clubhouse.

When Chairman Stephens has completed his appointments to committees definite action will begin. The interest in the Harlem regatta on Memorial Day is already greater than it has been in recent years, and gives good omen of a revival in the rowing game of New York City.

FOR BRONX TENNIS TITLE.

Seventy-seven Players in Tourney on Bedford Park Courts.

Many of the best racquet wielders in the metropolitan district competed yesterday in the annual tennis championship of Bronx County on the Bedford Park Lawn Tennis Club Courts, Moshula Parkway, Bronx. Seventy-seven players are entered in the singles and a record list is expected in the doubles, which close tonight.

Among the leading players are S. Howard Voshell, present champion; Vanderbilt Ward, former title holder; Arthur M. Lovibond, Walter Merrill Hall, G. A. L. Dionne, Wyle C. Grant, Ralph L. Baggs, Dr. William Rosenbaum, G. Carleton Shafer, King Smith and Abraham Bassford, Jr.

Dr. W. Rosenbaum and Dr. W. Krugler played their match on the New York A. C. courts at Travers Island, owing to the limited number of courts at Bedford Park. Dr. Rosenbaum won after two well contested games. The match between Vanderbilt Ward and Benjamin M. Phillips was one of the best of the two rounds decided. Ward won two out of three sets at 6—1, 7—9, 6—4. All the other matches were decided on straight sets. The summary:

Bronx County Tennis Championship, Men's Singles.—First Round—S. Clark defeated Franklin P. Adams, 6—3, 6—2; Louis Graves defeated T. F. Walsh, 6—4, 6—0; Dr. William Rosenbaum defeated Dr. W. Krugler, 6—4, 6—4; Vanderbilt Ward defeated Benjamin M. Phillips, 6—1, 7—9, 6—4; William Loeb defeated J. W. Fox by default; Allen Toby defeated G. B. Raymond by default.
Second Round—Harold Swain defeated B. J. Baldwin, 6—3, 6—3; Harry J. Steinkamp defeated E. H. Janes, 6—2, 6—1; W. M. Fisher defeated E. Barlow, 6—3, 7—5; W. Halsey Wood defeated Edmund W. Peaslee, 6—1, 6—4; S. Howard Voshell defeated A. V. N. Hoffman, 6—0, 6—1; G. G. Greuz defeated Paul Gould, 6—4, 6—0; Lincoln Reimer defeated V. C. Arguimbau by default; E. Henderson defeated Sigmund Spaeth, 6—3, 6—4; Wylie C. Grant defeated Paul L. Treanor, 7—5, 6—3; E. H. Whitney defeated Walter Touissant, 6—2, 6—4; R. L. James defeated F. Radel, 6—1, 6—0.

Hackett and Alexander Win.

After losing the first and second sets by big margins, H. H. Hackett and Fred Alexander, former national doubles tennis champions, yesterday rallied and took the next three sets from Karl Behr and Theodore R. Pell in an exhibition match which opened the season of the County Tennis Club of Westchester at Hartsdale, N. Y. The score was 2-6, 1-6, 6—2, 7—5, 6—4. Hackett and Alexander appeared certain to be defeated after they dropped the first two sets, but they broke down the attack of their opponents in the third set, which was bitterly contested. It took three hours and a half to play the match.

INDOOR CHAMPION WINS OUTDOOR FINAL

Miss Bjurstedt Defeats Mrs. McLean in Hard Match on West Side T. C. Courts.

Miss Molla Bjurstedt, of Norway, national indoor champion defeated Mrs. Marshall McLean in the final round of Class A singles on the West Side Tennis Club courts at Forest Hills, L. I., yesterday in straight sets by the score of 6—3, 8—6. Miss Bjurstedt showed little ill effects of her accident, which injured her ankle three days ago, and played very close to her real form. Mrs. McLean played her usual sterling game, and at one stage of the contest appeared likely to make a triple defeat for the Norwegian expert.

The match attracted a big gallery and brought out all the best playing qualities of the contestants for final honors. Miss Bjurstedt won the first set with little effort, but in the second set Mrs. McLean assumed the offensive and kept her opponent busy in all parts of the court. The score was brought to 6—all when Miss Bjurstedt broke through Mrs. McLean's service and followed with a victory of her own, which gave her the match.

In the mixed doubles Mrs. S. F. Weaver and Charles M. Bull, Jr., won two matches and reached the final round. In the first contest they disposed of Mrs. R. A. Pope and Hugh Tallant, and in the second they won from Mr. and Mrs. Robert Le Roy. In the final round Mrs. Weaver and Mr. Bull will play Mr. and Mrs. Robert Le Roy, who qualified through a victory over Miss May Ballin and A. F. Sweetser.

Darkness prevented the completion of the men's singles and doubles. These will be decided sometime this week. Robert Le Roy was successful in his match with King Smith. In the men's doubles Watson M. Washburn and Gustave F. Touchard had an unexpected hard match in the semi-final round, when Alrick H. Man, Jr., and Cedric A. Major forced them to three hard sets. Washburn and Touchard lost the first set and, with the second at deuce, rallied and captured the set and match by a small margin.

Miss Helen Simpson won the Class B singles title and Miss Marion Vanderhoef and E. S. Moore carried off the honors in the doubles of the same class. The summary:

Men's Singles, (Class A,) Third Round.—Robert Le Roy defeated King Smith, 6—3, 6—4.

Schedule of Woodmere Tennis Club.

In addition to the closed events, the tennis schedule of the Woodmere Club for the season of 1915 includes inter-club matches with the Fairview Country Club, and suitable dates are being arranged with several of the other Long Island clubs for inter-club matches.

The championship of Long Island in women's singles and doubles is an annual feature, and this event was won last year by Miss Clare Cassell, who will defend her title again. The open tournament in men's singles and doubles for the Woodmere Challenge Cup will, as usual, be the feature event of the season, and most of the ranking metropolitan players have signified their intention of competing, especially as this tournament does not conflict with any other metropolitan tournaments being held at the same time, as the Longwood event at Boston.

Previous winners of the Woodmere Challenge Cup included G. A. L. Dionne and Maurice Galvao, who is at present at the front with the German army.

Fordham Beats U. of V. at Tennis.

The Fordham tennis team added another victory to its list yesterday by shutting out the University of Vermont at the Fordham Courts by a score of 6 to 0. Fordham had things all its own way, Taggart of Vermont being the only one of the visitors to win a set. Taggart, teamed with Booth, also made a hard fight in the doubles, but the Vermonters were unable to connect with the speedy drives of Moore. Binzen starred for Fordham. Summaries:

Singles.—Binzen, Fordham, defeated Down, Vermont, 6—2, 6—4; Dodin, Fordham, defeated Robbins, Vermont, 6—4, 6—4; Reilly, Fordham, defeated Taggart, Vermont, 6—8, 5—7, 6—3; Moore, Fordham, defeated Booth, Vermont, 6—2, 6—3.
Doubles.—Binzen and Dodin, Fordham, defeated Robbins and Down, Vermont, 6—3, 6—2; Reilly and Moore, Fordham, defeated Booth and Taggart, Vermont, 6—4, 8—6.

New Tennis Club in Yonkers.

The Nappeckamack Club of Yonkers, which last year leased a portion of the Valley Farms tract in South Yonkers, has put in playing condition four excellent courts and has under construction four others. Although organized late last year the club rounded out the season with a substantial fembership, and the Membership Committee, of which Edward Jones is Chairman, is conducting a strurdy campaign for an increased roll. Among the players known in the suburban tournaments who have taken membership in the club are E. W. Salter, formerly of the Oritani Field Club of Hackensack; Malcolm Bonney(Gardner Dean, formerly of Dunwoodie, and Joseph Butterfield. All have competed in the Hudson River tournaments, and these, with others, promise an active season for the club. Tournaments are being planned for all the holidays and inter-club tournaments are promised throughout the season.

Narragansett Bay Y. C. Schedule.

The Narragansett Bay Yacht Racing Association has announced the schedule for the coming season, which will open at Fall River, Mass., on May 31. The schedule includes fifteen championship races. The association voted that no prizes will be awarded by the clubs during race week—July 17 to 24, inclusive—except place burgees. The association offers a prize for the yacht in each of the classes making the best showing during race week.

Mishap—Misuse

The Only Clouds That Ever Dim the Glory of Fortified Tires

To Our Coming Friends

When you join the army of Goodyear tire users, do not expect the impossible. No tire ever built is exempt from mishap or misuse. Goodyears sometimes meet ill-luck, like others.

But they average best. That is amply proved, and there is ample reason for it. Some give wondrous mileage, some meet accidents. But on the whole they mean much lower tire bills, much less trouble.

A 5-Million Average

Remember, please, that men have tested nearly five million Goodyear tires, on perhaps 500,000 cars. The tests have covered 15 years. And long ago those tests placed Goodyears at the top.

Last year we sold 1,479,883 pleasure car tires—about one for each car in use. Yet we have some hundred rivals. Doesn't that prove that men in general have found that Goodyear tires are best?

Five Major Reasons

The Goodyear Fortified Tire has five exclusive features. One combats rim-cuts, one blowouts, one loose treads. And all in the best ways known. One is the ideal anti-skid—our All-Weather tread—very thick, very tough, with sharp, resistless grips. And one gives security.

Note that all these features belong to Goodyear alone. They are extras on which we spend millions of dollars. And those are the main reasons why Goodyears rule.

Still Greater Value

On February 1st we made another big price reduction—our third in two years, totaling 45 per cent. Never has any tire offered such value as Goodyears give today. That results from our mammoth output.

We count all motorists among our coming friends. Tires which excel in so many ways appeal to all tire users. Try them and judge them fairly. Any dealer will supply you. (274)

AMERICA'S OBLIGATIONS IN CHINA

Dissolution of All International Treaties Through Japan's Onslaught Upon Peking and the Operation of Her Policies.

By Frederick McCormick.

THE words of the ancient sages are remembered in Cathay—China is "eating the bitter sausage."

No less than forty-four treaties are dissolving before Japan's continental policy exemplified in her demands upon China and her onslaught upon Peking.

Europe is mad and America is hypnotized.

Present or future leadership of East Asia, or the control of development there, especially the foreign control of China, involves the oldest foreign commercial and other national foreign rights and interests of the United States. The connection of our country with East Asia, especially China and the mainland, is identified with our national origin and birth. And we were involved there before the existence of any other international power in East Asia save Russia. If there is any place abroad where we can justly and rightly interfere in foreign affairs it is in East Asia.

In the start off, 1784, which was the real beginning, ours were sea-legs and we took to the water. We were shipmakers, our first important export was ships, and the only international and foreign thing we could do was in ships. We went, in as straight a line as a ship can take, to China. Canton was our aim—we waited not for charts—we took our school geographies from the little red schoolhouse down the road and fetched up on the Pearl down Whampoa way—there by the pagoda, and we got there in 1784.

We entered China, carrying with us the principle of complete submission to China's laws on the principle that "be they ever so unjust we will not resist them." In 1821, two years before the enunciation of the Monroe Doctrine, the last act of ours in adherence to that principle was performed in surrendering, at Canton, Terranova, a sailor, to punishment by Chinese law. In 1844 we wrote extraterritoriality into the treaties of China—extraterritoriality, the right of responsibility of foreigners only to their own laws, free right of trade and of travel, freedom from taxation, and in certain cases and to large classes universal right of free residence and free exercise, with no native restrictions, of volition and vocation—the instrument that is the means and defense of all interference in China's internal affairs. By it seventeen nations in specific terms were let into China, "each one of which nations must consent to the abrogation or modification of the doctrine [of extraterritoriality] before China can exercise the functions of an independent sovereign power."

Building Up.

Without burdening the reader with the treaty phraseology, which he can observe at his leisure, I will quote from T. R. Jernigan, our eminent ex-Consul General and international lawyer of Shanghai, who has witnessed fifty years of our treaty's operations in East Asia:

"The Government of the United States was the first to declare itself clearly and definitely with reference to extraterritoriality and its application to China," says Jernigan. The American-Chinese Treaty of July, 1844, set up the rights of foreign merchants and missionaries—"the first unequivocal announcement of the principle was made in this treaty by the Government of the United States."

Our participation and interference in the affairs of China, internal and external, have expanded from that until the present moment. In 1859 we rewrote and expanded the treaties, being the first to extend the rights of missionaries in China to superiority over the Chinese, and causing these rights to be incorporated at the same time in the French and British treaties and in others later. The rights of missionaries were the basis of the access to the interior of China soon enjoyed not only by the missionaries of all powers but by all travelers and merchants—all of whom enjoy extraterritorial immunity and protection.

The principles of the open door, already bespoken by Commander Kearny of the East India squadron, also were formally set up with the writing of our first treaty with China. This principle and the principle of the right to exercise interference in China's internal affairs went hand in hand. We proceeded to build up both of these together. In 1868 we signed the Burlingame Treaty for wider intercourse with Chinese in this country, but in 1880, on account of the greater benefit to China and in great contrast to that, we revised it to our own advantage and in further defense of extraterritorial rights exercised in the interior of China.

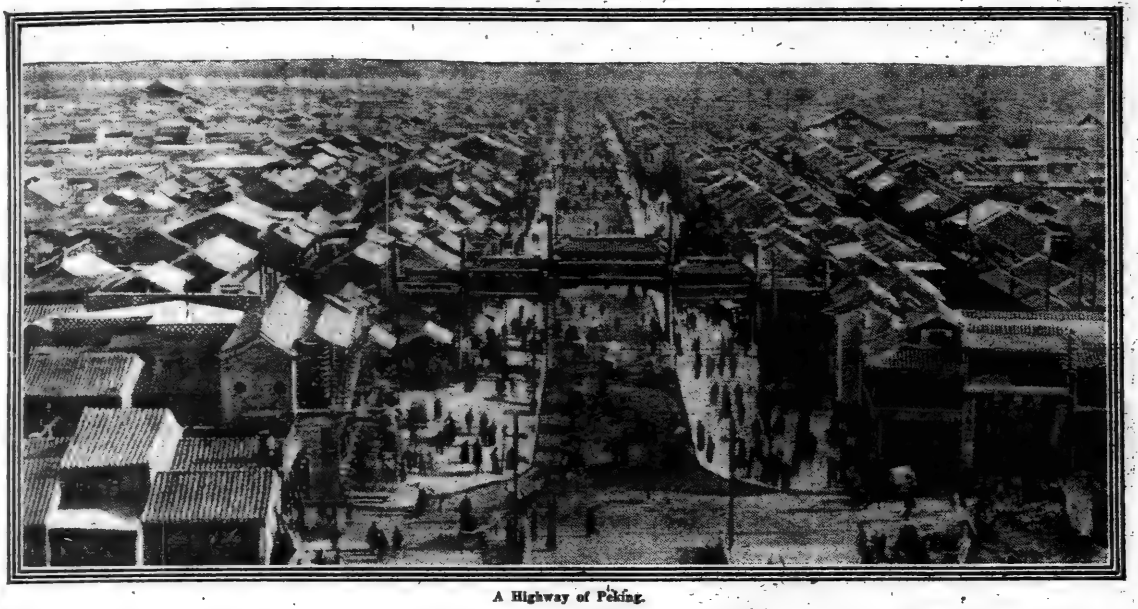
In 1899 and 1900, under the direction of John Hay, our Government secured the formal adhesion of the great powers to the written principles of the open door, namely, equal rights of all nations in China and the integrity of China's territory and the preservation of her sovereignty within it. Great Britain, Germany, France, Italy, and Japan adhered, and the other protocol powers followed, making eleven more conventions added to the seventeen commercial treaties, in all twenty-eight, in support of the principles of the open door and in defense of the right of interference in China's internal affairs established by the American treaty of 1844.

In 1901, with ten other powers, we signed the protocol for the adjustment of China's obligations entailed in the Boxer uprising, and by its terms, solemnly binding ourselves to those powers and to China, we specifically obligated ourselves to interfere in China's internal affairs for forty years. That omnibus protocol treaty fixed the amount of the Boxer indemnity and made one of its securities the salt revenues, one of China's incomes associated in peculiar intimacy with China's most officially private internal affairs. The protocol is a sheaf of eleven treaties, which, added to the twenty-eight, make thirty-nine treaties in support of the principles of the open door, all in declaration and defense of the practice of interference in China's internal affairs whenever in the minds of the treaty powers it seemed necessary to do so.

In emulation of our action in 1844 in first formally enunciating and setting up the principles of the open door and the principle of extra-territoriality in China and of thirty-eight subsequent treaties and conventions, two Russo-Japanese alliances, two Franco-Russian alliances, and the Root-Takahira agreement again re-established and confirmed the principles of the open door in China and the right of interference exercised under the principle of extraterritoriality, making in all forty-four living treaties, embodying the two cardinal principles governing all her foreign relations, and underlying the political existence of China, for which we are directly responsible. Therefore in a time like this we have certain definite, unmistakable, and unavoidable responsibilities and obligations in China.

Breaking Down.

This was the building-up work. The breaking-down processes were already exercising their influence. The fundamental weakness of the plan of relations between China and the powers to which we first gave form was extraterritoriality. Not content with this license, dissatisfied powers commenced the alienation of China's territory and the dividing of her sovereignty, thus exercising administration and control not only over their own people within her boundaries but over numbers of China's people and considerable areas of her territory. There followed certain breaks in the defenses of the open door doctrine. In 1904, unable to restrain two of the East Asian alliance powers, Russia and Japan, from military occupation of all of Korea—suzerain to China—and the Manchu



A Highway of Peking.

Kingdom of three Chinese provinces adjoining, we made the insidious war zone agreement, which, though restricting land military operations within China's borders, at the same time sanctioned in them a flagrant violation of China's integrity and neutrality. This was followed in 1909 by our acquiesence in the rights claimed by Russia and Japan of sovereignty in the railway zones throughout Manchuria after heroic, though futile, effort by Secretary Knox in the proposal for the neutralization of the Manchurian railways to stay the processes of disintegration of the principles of the open door.

In 1912 the Anglo-Japanese and Franco-Japanese allies, having now become the four Manchurian allies associated for the remaking of international relations in East Asia, Central Asia, and Europe, we finally abandoned our Korean treaty, which had become a mere scrap of paper. We saw that the mutual interests of the powers and the preservation of China must be based upon rearrangement and readjustment to the interests of the Manchurian allies of the open door principles. Secretary Knox made a final great effort. He sought to unite the capitalistic powers, causing them to pool their industrial and commercial interests in China and to submit them to joint and associate control in order to insure their own material interests in China and the security and welfare of China. Six powers united in this revision of the principles of the open door presented by us and devised on the immemorial principles of our intercourse with all powers in China, both those of the open door and of extraterritoriality.

We were then face to face with a new era. A change in our Government at a period of resentment and feeling against finance and capital and the so-called money power resulted in the repudiation by our Government of the means secured by the coalition of the six powers for sustaining the open door policy and saving China. The coalition of the six powers was based on the principle that the prosperity and development of China were the source of their best interests there, and it provided loans to China for developing her resources and making competent her administration. It involved associate supervision in co-operation with China of the work of development and administration. It had the great advantage over the menacing wildcat system of the past known as the "gun-boat policy" that it provided legality and control in the interference in China's internal affairs, while the worst that justly could be said against it was that it promised to China such benefits as the administration under Lord Cromer had conferred upon Egypt in the financial and industrial direction of that country, or the rehabilitation of Turkey by the commission method.

Without questioning the motives and good faith of any one concerned, it may be said that on March 18, 1913, President Wilson gave the deathblow to this defense and salvation of the principles of the open door doctrine and to our railway concessions all north of the Great Wall, by withdrawing support of the loan and repudiating the Government's position. The President's words were:

> The conditions of the loan seem to us to touch very nearly the administrative independence of China itself; and this Administration does not feel that it ought, even by implication, to be party to those conditions. The responsibility on its part which would be implied in requesting the bankers to undertake the loan might conceivably go the length in some unhappy contingency of forcible interference in the financial and even the political affairs of that great Oriental State, just now awakening to a consciousness of its power and of its obligations to its people. The conditions include not only the pledging of particular taxes, some of them antiquated and burdensome, to secure the loan, but also the administration of those taxes by foreign agents.
> The responsibility on the part of our Government implied in the encouragement of a loan thus secured and administered is plain enough, and is obnoxious to the principles upon which the Government of our people rests.
> The Government of the United States is not only willing but earnestly desirous of aiding the great Chinese people in every way that is consistent with their untrammeled development and its own immemorial principles. The awakening of the people of China to a consciousness of their possibilities under free government is the most significant, if not the most momentous, event of our generation.

President Wilson's declaration was the most important policy advanced by our Government since the declarations of 1900 secured by it from the powers, again setting up the open door doctrine. It traversed at least the practice respecting East Asia of every other President since Polk.

On Jan. 26, 1914, in New York, Secretary Bryan made an authorized official explanation of President Wilson's reversal of the Government's policy respecting the loan and the means taken for defending the principles of the open door through industrial development and control of the physical forces that were directing China's fate. Said he:

> The President's policy contemplates the formation of an environment which will encourage the growth of all that is good * * * the Government, while it cannot create trade, can give to trade an environment in which it can develop. * * * If by a cultivation of higher standards of morals we can assist any people anywhere to improve their moral standards, we shall not be without our reward.
> Whether we view the world, therefore, from a purely material standpoint or from the standpoint of religion, we must, if our force of reason is intelligent, reach the same conclusions, viz., that we only build enduringly when we endeavor to raise the level upon which we all stand.

An honest and able effort was made by the hearers of these words to know and realize what they meant, and concurrence of the best opinion resulted in the conviction that the Secretary, and before him the President, meant that promotion of the material interests of our country represented by trade with and industrial development in China had its basis in the securing first of the moral and religious welfare of the Chinese people. In this Secretary Bryan traversed the principles upon which had acted our Secretaries of State who preceded him back to John C. Calhoun, notably William H. Seward, who forty-four years ago, at Hongkong, on the scene of the first co-operation of missionary moral and religious and commercial enterprise for the promotion of commerce and the welfare of the Chinese people, said:

> The Christian religion, for its acceptance, involves some intellectual and social advancement which can only be effected through international commerce. I look therefore chiefly to commerce for the regeneration of China—that commerce to come across the American Continent and the Pacific Ocean.

In referring to the forces which guaranteed the continuance and increase of that commerce, Seward named the material necessities first, and said there was "no assignable measure to the future expansions of the intercontinental regenerating commerce." Through commerce, Seward saw China's salvation.

Parting of the Ways.

The defects of President Wilson's statement as showing our relations with China and the powers, China's position then, and her abject condition as the largest nation in a now thoroughly sad world, are only too evident. The course of action ever has led to conflict and "forcible interference." Taxes ever have been "antiquated and burdensome." All taxes on foreign commerce, part on native commerce, and all postal revenues in China were administered by foreign agents. The practical conditions of China's problems may be obnoxious, but they have not deterred our missionaries, traders, and financiers from needful and essential efforts to better them. The "untrammeled development" of the Chinese people has never had any existence, it is something unknown, and the fact that there was no prospect of it was the cause of the financial measures of safety and progress devised by the Governments. China's development is entirely due to pressure of the West and the operation of the principles of the open door and of extraterritoriality and the consistent interference and influencing of China's intimate internal and external affairs by foreign powers.

The "immemorial principles" of our Government in its relations to China and the powers have been those of intelligent acceptance of the practical conditions and inevitable facts of extraterritoriality, which we have steadily practiced since not later than July, 1844, and in principle since 1821. Extraterritoriality as practiced in China by first treaty sanction of the United States for seventy-one years is in effect the supreme law of interference in China's affairs, especially her private internal affairs. They are not only the steel, concrete, and granite sills of all China's commercial and industrial development, but they underlie the development of Siam, they supplied the modern foundations of the Empire of Japan, while our vast missionary establishment in China, involving more wealth and exerting a more extensive benevolence and practical support to the Chinese people than all other missions in China combined, has as its cornerstone the exercise of rights alienated from China, gripping her innermost vitals—and forming the widest of all scars across her corporal sovereignty.

But we did not intend that the exercise of interference should be followed by the alienation of territory and the transfer of administration. Now that it has come, we face a parting of the ways, and those friends of China who have placed their faith upon this Government may prepare to take a last look at what they have stood for, because forty-four treaties molded by us to inclose her are turning to scraps of paper.

Industrial and administrative progress, sought for in the American loan policy of 1912, adopted by the six powers, and material interests represented in trade prevail in molding the fate of China. The practical affairs that are deciding the future of China and the interests of all powers there are the material interests of Japan directed by diplomacy and enforced by the moral and military support of her allies.

In contrast to the Government's views, in the present emergency the moral interests at stake represented in our missions in China immediately appealed to Washington for intervention. Two commissions from China visited the President and the Secretary of State. Their whole need was the six-power loan—the operation of the combined forces of the material interests of the great powers. The theory and ideal of President Wilson and Secretary Bryan were found to have no more weight in East Asia than in Belgium.

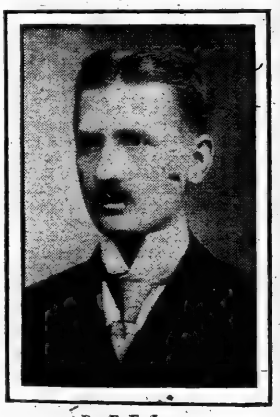
Our movement into foreign affairs was so rapid that Washington's words were hardly cold before we were involved in the Pacific in the course which he proscribed in the Atlantic. Almost at once we were involved, as we now know was inevitable. We shunned the Atlantic and we have tried to ignore the Pacific, and the present situation is the rebound of what has been regarded as our immemorial principles.

Good-bye, John.

A policy that forced Secretary Root to abandon contention against Russia's administration of Harbin, and Secretary Knox to acquiesce in Russian and Japanese claims to sovereign authority in the railway zones of Manchuria, the abandonment of our treaties with Korea, of our railway concessions north of the Great Wall, the alienation of Outer Mongolia, and forcible demands of extension of special rights in agreement with a policy based on principles the opposite of those of the open door and equal rights, a policy that aims at and seeks the undermining of all treaties in China, and their rewriting as those with Korea are rewritten, and of Manchuria as well, leaves nothing of our rights in China unscathed. It is not necessary to ask if our rights and interests are transgressed by Japan.

NEW GUN THAT SHELLED DUNKIRK

Germans Produce One Which Hurls Missiles 21 Miles, the Impelling Power Being a Highly Explosive Gas Mixture.



Dr. F. E. Junge.

THE new gun which Germany brought into use for the first time on April 30 against Dunkirk threw its missiles from twenty-one to twenty-three miles, establishing a record as the greatest long-range firing ever known in actual warfare.

Dr. Franz Erich Junge, a German naval constructor who has been in America for some time as consulting engineer for German and American industrial concerns, said last week, in discussing with a TIMES man some of the features which have aroused the attention of war experts, that he did not believe the limit of long range firing had by any means been reached. He also explained several things about the mechanism of Germany's latest long distance gun which clear up some of the erroneous ideas about it.

"This latest German gun, which has been tried out against Dunkirk for the first time," said Dr. Junge, "is one of the new 50-centimeter type about which much has been heard but little definite information generally known. The radical difference between this and other long-distance guns lies in the impelling power, which is derived from a highly explosive gas mixture, thereby doing away with enormous charges of powder and reducing to a considerable degree the cost of operating.

"This mixture is prepared by compressing air to very high pressures and injecting oil into it at the proper time, thus obviating the use of a large charge of powder for each firing of the gun. Not only does it reduce the initial cost, but it facilitates the working of the gun.

"The construction of the modern gun is based upon the same lines as the construction of the internal combustion engine, so much so that even the designers of internal combustion engines become designers of large guns. The big gun is practically a cylinder with a piston in it, but with this difference from the engine—that the gun piston is the projectile itself. Also, like the engine, guns must be cooled by water and oil.

"Another important feature of this latest gun and one which has not been generally appreciated is that it is possible to use projectiles of different calibre. For long-distance firing a smaller projectile is used, while for attacking fortresses at shorter range the large 50-centimeter calibre projectile can be used. This is managed by the use of different cylinders. Let us say that the 50-centimeter gun is built for firing missiles of three different sizes. It is evident that a projectile of about twelve-inch calibre was fired in the long distance attack upon Dunkirk. At the present state of gun-firing ability that is the largest-sized projectile which can reasonably be fired for such a long distance. The heavier weight of the larger projectiles makes a carrying distance of twenty-three miles impossible now."

The ability of this so-called Dunkirk gun to use different sized cylinders readily explains some of the confused views which have prevailed about this instrument of destruction. The ordnance experts at Washington, in discussing the twenty-three-mile feat a few days ago, were of the opinion, and rightly, that a gun of no greater calibre than twelve inches could have been used successfully in the attack on Dunkirk, stating that it would be impossible to attain a distance of from twenty-one to twenty-three miles with the fifty-centimeter projectile, equal to 19.6 inches. Dr. Junge's explanation that a twelve-inch cylinder may be slipped into the gun shows how a missile of that calibre may be fired from a gun constructed to fire a missile of nearly twenty inches.

It is of interest to note, as contrasted with the twenty-three-mile carrying ability of the new German gun, that the American army experts have made elaborate computations of what might be accomplished by the latest American twelve-inch coast defense gun, and it has been shown that when fired at an angle of 45 degrees such a gun has a range of 55,000 yards, or over thirty-one miles.

"No actual limit can be placed on the long-range firing possibility of big guns," added Dr. Junge. "With a more powerful explosive force behind the projectile, it would naturally carry further. This is what has given the new German gun the ability of successful long-range firing."

Dr. Junge was asked if he thought successful long-range firing could be accomplished for distances of fifty to one hundred miles. He admitted the difficulties at such distances both from the heavier weight of the projectile and the effect of air currents in swerving the missile ever so slightly from its course and thereby preventing, at abnormal distances, the unerring accuracy now obtainable for distances up to twenty miles and over.

"Why may it not be possible, in the wars of the future, if there are any," he said, "to use air torpedoes for such distances? Experiments have been under way for some time in German factories in the construction of air torpedoes. Like the torpedoes shot from the submarine, they all possess a propelling force of their own, set in motion as soon as they are shot into the air. Let us suppose this may be possible, and then place an aeroplane or Zeppelin equipped with a strong wireless electric plant above the line of flight of these destroying air torpedoes.

"We have already demonstrated the ability of guiding boats by means of electric waves, and why could not the flight of these huge air torpedoes be guided with accuracy to their striking point, 100 miles or more distant? We are just beginning to appreciate the remarkable possibilities in the use of electric waves upon other bodies, and that is one point for future scientific development which will be one of the heritages of the war."

Dr. Junge takes a deeper interest in submarines than in big guns, and he made the interesting statement that four of the newest German oil engines of large horse power have been completed here by the General Electric works, from German designs, for the United States Government.

"This war is a struggle of machinists," said Dr. Junge. "It is the superior individual intelligence, coupled with the better system of organization, which will decide the issue. The naval contest, particularly, will be influenced largely by the technical equipment of the respective fighting crafts, especially by propelling machinery, because speed and radius of action are, next to attacking armament, the principal factors forcing the decision.

"The motive power equipment of the German war vessels, and particularly of the submarine boats, is based on a German invention known as the Diesel oil engine. In fact, the navies of all countries are bound to use this engine, unless they want to drop hopelessly behind in the race of efficiency, for steam power, though simpler, gives only one-third of the cruising radius.

"This engine has, of late, been improved, or, rather, has been replaced by a superior type, known as the Junkers engine, which possesses all the economic advantages of the Diesel engine without any of its drawbacks. This engine, of which several have been acquired by the United States Government, burns crude oil and Mexican oil, using only four-tenths pounds per horse power, and the oil gives the vessel practically an unlimited cruising radius if the storage capacity is sufficiently high.

"The new German submarine cruisers now in course of construction will be able to go 10,000 miles without replenishing, thus becoming an attacking weapon of the first order. If necessary to replenish with fuel away from the base of supplies the oil may be obtained from submerged tanks located at convenient points in the ocean, their longitude and latitude being known only to one navy. These submerged tanks will be fitted with an electric appliance arranged so as to respond to or synchronize with the wireless electric waves from the submarine, causing the tank to rise to the surface. These tanks have water compartments in which more water may be pumped after a supply of oil has been taken. They have been designed and are in existence, but whether in actual use or not I cannot say."

One of the lessons of the war, said Dr. Junge, which is going to command greater attention in the future than most persons realize is the necessity for submersible boats of different fighting abilities.

"I am a great believer in the submarine," he added, "and, indeed, no one can have followed the events of the present war on the water without coming to that conviction. The war has proved, I think conclusively, that the attacking armament is stronger than the defensive armament. The guns have been more powerful than the armor plate. This is bound to exert an important influence upon the tactics of naval warfare especially.

"The two tendencies, as I view them, will be to build bigger and more powerful guns, and make a radical change in the type of fighting vessels. I firmly believe that the naval warfare of the future will be conducted entirely by submersible boats. We are building larger submarine craft all the time, and it is not inconceivable at all to predict that the time will come when large-sized fighting craft will be able to be submerged. It may be too much to predict that such immense boats as the largest dreadnoughts can be successfully submerged, but boats of that type are likely to be absolutely useless before long.

"Experiments are now being conducted on the plan of submerging fighting boats of the size of the average light cruiser. They may be equipped with collapsible gun decks or other disappearing devices inclosing everything watertight when beneath the surface. Such boats need not have a great moving ability under water; their chief purpose will be to keep out of sight when a stronger hostile force appears. If the German boats, for instance, that were sent to the bottom off the Falkland Islands had been able to submerge they could have kept out of sight until the English force passed.

"One blessing of militarism is that it will exercise, after the war, a favorable influence on peaceable industrial development, thereby increasing the means of communication and contact between various nations. This tendency is now being shown, although little public attention can be devoted to it until more peaceful conditions prevail, in the preparations virtually completed in Germany to construct a large passenger ocean liner driven exclusively by oil motors, one having a capacity of 50,000 horse power and propelled by engines having 100,000 shaft horse power, or sufficient to develop a speed of twenty-seven knots.

"The power plant in this boat will weigh 9,000 tons, including the auxiliary engines, propellers, shafting, &c. The engines will consume about 6,400 tons of crude oil on a return trip from Hamburg to New York. This boat will be of the size of the latest German steamers, such as the Vaterland, but a staff of only about eighty men to work the engines will be required. The future profits to be derived from the use of motor equipment instead of steam in ocean liners will consist less in the reduction of the fuel bill than in the saving from the elimination of from 200 to 400 coal stokers and firemen.

"The designs for this large oil motor boat are completed, but, of course, no effort at actual construction can be attempted until we have peace."

SERBIA BATTLES WITH TYPHUS

Young American Sculptor, Working with the Red Cross, Writes of Conditions in the Fighting Zone.

The article which follows is a portion of a letter written by Cecil Howard, a young American sculptor well known in Paris, to a friend in the French capital. The letter is dated at Vrnjatchka Banja, Serbia, on March 26. Mr. Howard, who is now with the British Red Cross in Serbia, is a sociétaire of the Salon des Beaux Arts. His sister is Miss Kathleen Howard of the Century Opera Company.

By Cecil Howard.

WE have seen something of the Serbian soldier. He is a well-built and rather handsome fellow dressed in all sorts of outlandish garments, unless he is a more recent recruit, in which case he has a very neat uniform of a particularly good warm gray color. From the time our train crossed the frontier we heard a good deal of scrambling about and talking going on outside on the steps and on top of the cars, and later discovered that, while we had spent a sleepless and shivering night in our overcoats and blankets inside the train, fifty or sixty Serbian soldiers had been hanging on outside, and showed up smiling and cheerful in the morning.

As we stopped at dawn, I went down the platform the length of the train and saw that we had several trucks of artillery on behind, also filled with soldiers. One had two rifles on his back and was guarding three Austrian prisoners, one of whom had his arms bound behind his back. This is really all we have seen of troops on the move in Serbia, and we have heard less.

At Gevgelija, however, we first heard of some other troubles of Serbia. We met at the station some American doctors who are working there. They told us of crowded hospitals and the difficulties of caring for thousands of sick and wounded without nurses and in filthy old buildings. We were duly warned against the great enemies—lice and overwork. Five of their staff were down with "it" and one was dead. Their last words to us as the train pulled out were: "Remember, the treatment is five drops of tincture of iodine twice daily." "It" is typhus.

We reached Nish, were formally received by representatives of the Serbian Government and the Service de Santé, &c., and spent a day sightseeing. It is a place of wide mud streets and low whitewashed houses with a few shops where you can buy most things you don't want and some that you do. The sights are chiefly bullock carts—the eternal Serbian bullock carts, driven by peasants in brown sacking and weird footgear, consisting of socks outside the trousers, and sandals. The socks are a great feature and one of the most remarkable things in Serbia. They are half an inch thick and have color schemes like the Salon des Indépendents in all its glory.

Another great feature is the Austrian prisoner, whose acquaintance we made at Nish. There are some 60,000 of them and they seem to do most of the hard work of the country—cleaning streets, mending roads, building, and working as orderlies in the hospitals. They are most convenient but a mixed blessing, as the Serbs say it is they who brought the great trouble into Serbia—typhus, which has been on the rampage all Winter.

Typhus is a disease of dirt, overcrowding, and underfeeding, and is carried from the sick to the well by lice. This sounds soft enough for clean people, but in Serbia it is not always easy to keep clean, and a louse or two is almost unavoidable, when nursing dirty patients in old and filthy buildings.

The death rate has been rather high at Nish and Ouskoub, particularly among the prisoners. Some English and American doctors have also succumbed. The great trouble is that the various hospital staffs are much too small to tackle the thousands of patients or to undertake thorough cleansing of the hospital buildings. On the main street of Nish is a coffinmaker's shop doing a humming trade, with dozens of plain board coffins out in front on the sidewalk. On the hill outside the town we saw rows and rows of little wooden crosses and picked up plenty of cartridge cases, mostly Turkish ones. These are being used by the Serbian Army now and were captured in the last war.

On arriving at Vrnjatchka Banja, after another night in the train, changing at Kruchevatz, which is about thirty miles from here, the first thing we did after the official reception was to visit all the available buildings in the town and pick out the Sanatorium, a new building with water supply, bath tubs, and electric light, for our main hospital. In time of peace this village is a Thermal station and health resort. There are hot springs and big hotels, so is well adapted for a hospital town.

When our sanatorium was in running order and filled with about sixty cases taken from the numerous native hospitals in the village, we took over three other buildings, which we fumigated and cleaned and made into two convalescent hospitals and a clearing house. The last is for the purpose of receiving and sorting out the newly arriving patients—bunches of 150 or so, usually—where the typhus suspects are kept till the disease declares itself fully, or the incubation period, two weeks, has elapsed, when they are sent on to the other hospitals or the typhus barracks, which are now taken over by the Bennet party, (Sir Thomas Lipton's crowd,) and made clean and efficient.

Now that all new patients arriving in the village are bathed and clearly clothed and the typhus cases are sorted out, the epidemic is on the wane, and very few cases have been contracted here. Two Greek doctors, who were running a hospital here when we arrived, have fallen victims, and one died. One of the Bennet party also developed a slight case soon after arrival, but is now well. Most of the present cases are Austrians recently arrived with the infection on them.

There are two English missions here in Vrnjatchka Banja now—ours, which is organized and directed by Dr. Berry of the Royal Free Hospital, London, and consists of twenty-six members, and Captain Bennet's, which was sent out by the British Red Cross Society on Lipton's yacht. Their mission is chiefly medical, while ours is surgical, and we generally divide work. They run two surgical hospitals and the typhus barracks.

We have taken over the bathhouse of the village—a large pool filled by the hot springs—for a washing house for new patients, and it is a great sight to see them arriving through the snow in bullock carts to be put through the mill of clipping and scrubbing in batches of fifteen or twenty at once. The bad cases are washed on tables and the light ones are pushed into the pool to soak.

We couldn't do half what we do without the Austrians. With the Bennets, we have about sixty of them. It was a fine sight when we picked them out from a bunch of about 150 lined up for our inspection, like a slave market, asking searching questions and feeling muscles. Most of the prisoners seem to be Bohemians, Bosnians, Tzchecks, Croats, &c., and I imagine they were easy captures. Half of them speak Serbian and few speak good German. One of ours, a Bohemian, was a waiter at the Carlton in London before the war, has also been in America, and speaks good English, French, Italian and German. We also have carpenters, stone masons, engineers, &c. The engineers of the sanatorium were taken prisoners by the director of the sanatorium in person during the great Austrian retreat.

The Serbs are very proud of their success over Austria and say that with 500,000 men they would be in Vienna in a month. Maybe they would. They seem a fine lot of men and are renowned for being able to take care of themselves and for not bothering the Government about food or clothing. Give a Serbian soldier a loaf of bread and he will march and fight for two days. Give him nothing at all and he will say it is hard luck, but he will march and fight just the same. This is their boast, and it seems to be no more than the truth.

Some of them are very brave fellows, as we can see in hospital, many preferring even rather serious operations without anaesthetic and standing it without a wink.

The man who is in charge of the commissariat post of the hospitals of this district—Neuhut by name—is a great card. He found it convenient to spend five years in America after the assassination of the late King and his wife, so speaks broken American most fluently.

The Serbs about here think us all rather mad, and can't understand why we work so hard. They are especially astounded by our willingness to do hard labor. One day we were digging a ditch for drainage and a Serb who was driving an ox-cart stopped and sat down to watch us for an hour or two. Finally he said: "You work too hard," and went on down the road with his oxen, playing a naif tune on a sort of double flute, like you see in Greek drawings of fauns.

There are many funerals, of course. The coffin shop in the backyard of one of the hospitals is a busy spot, and on the hillside beyond the village there are rows and rows of wooden crosses with names and dates painted on them. A fresh row of graves is dug every day and usually filled the next.

The Serbians are great on going out in bands of fifty or sixty, working independently almost, and foraging for themselves. They are very fond of hand grenades and bayonet fighting and seem brave as lions. One can quite believe that in their own rather wild country they are practically invincible. They are a cheerful and sympathetic lot, and we find them very easy patients to handle. The Government and military authorities fall in with all our plans, making everything as easy as possible for us.

One thing you may not have heard. I have it on good authority that there are English, French, and Russian soldiers in Belgrade, and have been for some time. They are gunners sent out with their own guns, about fifty each of English and French, and a good many more Russians.

GEN. FOCH, NEW MASTER OF WAR

A Great Figure Has Arisen in France, Second Only to Joffre—He Has in Him Something of the Napoleonic

"FIND out the weak point of your enemy and deliver your blow there," said the Commander of the Twentieth French Army Corps at Nancy at a staff banquet in 1913.

"But suppose, General," said an artillery officer, "that the enemy has no weak point?"

"If the enemy has no weak point," returned the commander, with a gleam of the eye and an aggressive tilt of the chin, "make one."

The commander was Foch—Ferdinand Foch—who has recently flashed before the world as the greatest leader in the French Army after Joffre, and who in that remark at Nancy gave the index to the basic quality of his character as a General. General Foch is today in command of the northern armies of France, besides being the chief Lieutenant and confidant of Joffre. Joffre conceives; Foch, master tactician, executes. He finds the weak point; if there is no weak point, he creates or seeks to create one.

When King George of England was at the front in France recently he conferred the Grand Cross of the Order of the Bath—the highest military distinction in the form of an order within the gift of the British Crown—on two Frenchmen. Joffre was one. The other was Foch.

"Foch? Foch? Who is Foch?" asked the British public, perplexed, when the newspapers printed the news of the granting of this signal honor.

"Foch is the General who was at the head of the French military mission which followed our army manoeuvres three years ago," replied a few men who happened to have been intimately acquainted with those manoeuvres.

"But what has that to do with the Grand Cross of the Order of the Bath?" asked John Bull. And the manoeuvre experts not being able to reply, the English newspapers demanded from their correspondents in France an answer to the query, "Who is Foch? Why the Grand Cross?"

And the main features of the answers to that query were these:

Foch is the "greatest strategist in Europe and the humblest," in the words of Joffre.

Foch is the hero of the Marne, the man who perceived on Sept. 9 that there must be a gap between the Prussian Guard and the Saxon Army, and who gathered enough artillery to crush the guard in the St. Gond marshes and forced both the Prussians and the Saxons, now separated, to retreat.

Foch is the man of Ypres, the commander who was in general control of the first successful fight made by the French and the British, aided by the Belgians, to prevent the Germans from breaking through to Calais.

Foch, in short, is one of the military geniuses of the war, so record observers at the front. He is a General who has something of the Napoleonic in his composition; the dramatic in war is for him—secrecy and suddenness, gigantic and daring movements; fiery, yet coldly calculated attacks; vast strategic conceptions carried out by swift, unfaltering tactics. Foch has a tendency to the impetuous, but he is impetuous scientifically. He has, however, taken, all in all, much more of the dash and nervousness and warmth of the Southern Latin than has Joffre—cool, cautious, taciturn Joffre. Yet both men are from the south of France. They were born within a few miles of one another, within three months of one another, Foch being born on Oct. 2, 1851, and Joffre on Jan. 12, 1852.

Most writers who have dealt with Foch agree on this as one of his paramount characteristics—the Napoleonic mode of military thought. When Foch was director of the Ecole de Guerre, where he had much to do with shaping the military views of many of the men who are now commanding units of the French Armies, he was considered to be possessed of almost an obsession on the subject of Napoleon. He studied Napoleon's campaigns, and restudied them. He went back much further, however, in his choice of a master, and gave intense application to the campaigns of Caesar. Napoleon and Caesar—these were the minds from which the mind of the Marne and Ypres has learned some of its lessons of success.

General Ferdinand Foch.

Here Foch invites comparison with another of the dominant figures of the war—General French. For French is described by his biographer as "a worshipper of Napoleon," regarding him as the world's greatest strategist, and in following out and studying Napoleon's campaigns French personally covered and studied much of the ground in Belgium over which he has been fighting. French is a year younger than Foch. They are old friends, as are French and Joffre, and Joffre and Foch.

The inclination of Foch to something of the Napoleonic is shown beyond the realm of strategy and tactics. Foch is credited with knowing the French soldier, his heart, his mind, his capabilities, and the method of getting the most out of those capabilities, in a way reminiscent of the winner of Jena. And Foch knows not only the privates, but the officers. When he went to the front he visited each commander; the Colonels he called by name; the corps commanders, without exception, had attended his lectures at the Ecole de Guerre.

As for the men, Foch makes it his business to get into personal contact with them, as Napoleon used to do. Foch does not hobnob with them, there is no joking or familiarity, but he goes into the trenches and the occupied villages and looks the men over informally, inspects food or equipment, makes a useful comment or two, drops a phrase that is worth repeating, and leaves behind him enthusiasm and respect. The Paris Figaro says that he has the gift of setting souls afire, of arousing that élan in the French fighter which made that fighter perform military miracles when the "sun of Austerlitz" was high. It has been declared by a French writer that Foch knows the human element in the French Army better than any other man living.

With all his knowledge of men, his power of inspiring them, Foch is quiet, retiring, non-communicative, with no taste for meeting people in social intercourse. His life has been monotonous—work and work and work. He has the reputation of being a driver; he used to be particularly severe on shirkers in the war college, and such, no matter what their influence, had no chance of getting a diploma leading to an attractive staff position when Foch was Director. When he was in command at Nancy and elsewhere he used to work his staffs hard, and they had to share much of the monotony of work which has been chiefly Foch's life. He did not go in for society, merely making the formal calls required by the etiquette of garrison towns on the chief garrison hostesses, and giving dinners two or three times a year to his staff.

Foch, indeed, with his quiet ways and his hard work and his studying of Napoleon and Caesar, was characterized by some of the officers of the army as a pedant, a theorist, and these held that Foch had small chance of doing anything important in such a practical realm as that of real war.

Because of his Directorship of the Ecole de Guerre he was known to many officers, but as far as France at large was concerned his name was scarcely known at all last August. Yet officers knew him in other lands besides his own. His two great books, "Principles of War" and "Conduct of War," have been translated into English, German, and Italian, and are highly regarded by military men. He has been ranked by the Militär-Wochenblatt, organ of the German General Staff, as one of the few strategists of first class ability among the Allies.

Foch is a slim man, with a great deal of nervous energy in his actions, being so quick and graceful in movement, indeed, that a recent English observer declares he carries himself more like a man of 40 than one of 64. His gray blue eyes are particularly to be noticed, so keen are they. His speech is quick, precise, logical.

So little has Foch been known to the French public that it has been stated time and again that he is an Alsatian. He is not, but comes of a Basque family which has lived for many generations in the territory which is now the Department of the Hautes-Pyrénées, directly on the border of Spain. Foch was born in the town of Tarbes in that department. Joffre was born in the Department Pyrénées-Orientales, on the Spanish border to the east. Foch's father, Napoleon Foch, was a Bonapartist and Secretary of the Prefecture at Tarbes under Napoleon III. One of his two brothers, a lawyer, is also called Napoleon. The other is a Jesuit priest. Foch and these brothers attended the local college, and then turned to their professions.

In 1870 Foch served as a subaltern against the Germans, as did Joffre. After the war Foch began to win recognition as a man of brains, and at 26 he was given a commission as artillery Captain. Later he became Professor of Tactics in the Ecole de Guerre, with the title of Commandant, where he remained for five years, and then returned to regimental work. It was when Foch reached the grade of Brigadier General that he went back to the War College, this time as Director, one of the most confidential positions in the War Department. From this post he went to the command of the Thirteenth Division, thence to the command of the Eighth Corps at Bourges, and thence to the command of the Twentieth Corps at Nancy.

At the time that Foch was appointed Director of the Ecole de Guerre, Clemenceau was Premier, and upon the latter fell the task of choosing an officer for the important Directorship. There was keen competition for the position, many influential Generals desiring the appointment, and in consequence much wire-pulling went on. The story goes that Clemenceau, a man of action, became impatient of the intrigues for the post, and determined to make his own choice unhampered.

According to the story, Clemenceau, after a conference one day upon routine business with Foch, asked the latter to dine. The Ecole de Guerre was not mentioned during the meal, the men chatting upon general topics. But as the coffee was being brought on, the Premier turned suddenly to the General and said, brusquely:

"By the way, I've a good bit of news for you. You're nominated Director of the Ecole de Guerre."

"Director of the Ecole de Guerre! But I'm not a candidate for the post."

"That is possible. But you're appointed all the same, and I know you will do excellent work in the position."

Foch thanked the Premier, but he still had some doubts, and added:

"I fear you don't know all my family connections. I have a brother who is a Jesuit."

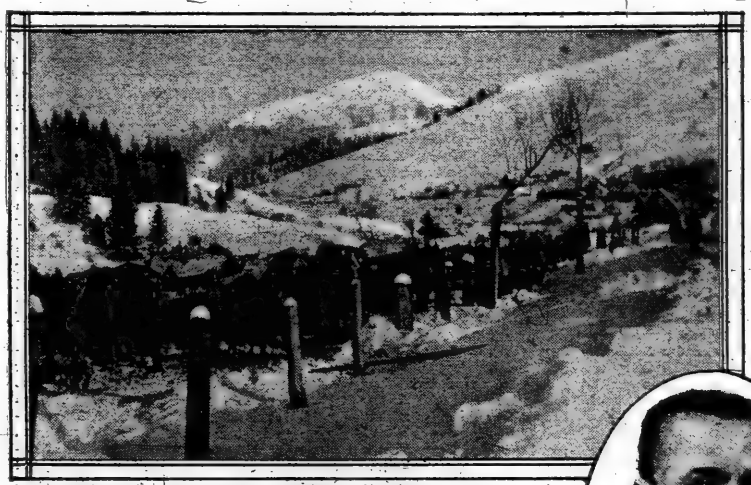
"Jesuit be d——!" the Premier is reported to have roared in reply. "Oh, I beg your pardon, Mr. Director! You are the Director of the Ecole de Guerre. All the Jesuits in creation won't alter that—it is a fait accompli."

Among the confidential bits of work worthy of note that Foch has done for the War Department is the report he made upon the larger guns of the French field artillery, which have done such execution in the present war. For many weeks Foch went around the great Creusot gun works in the blouse of a workman, testing, watching, experimenting, analyzing.

Foch was one of the high officers in France who was not in the least surprised by the war and who had personally been holding himself in readiness for it for years. He felt, and often said, that a great war was inevitable; so much used he to dwell upon the certainty of war that some persons regarded him as an alarmist when he kept declaring that French officers should take every step within their power to get themselves and the troops ready for active service.

LITTLE KNOWN LAND OF BUKOWINA

Now the Battleground of Austrians and Russians, Sandwiched in Between Galicia and Rumania



Convoy of Austrians in Bukowina

The Late Ferdinand Burg and Wife

Count Johann Meran, Austrian Gov. of Bukowina

By a Veteran Diplomat.

FEW Americans had ever heard of the Duchy of Bukowina before the outbreak of the present war or were aware that there was any such a title in existence as that of Duke of Bukowina.

It is a dignity which is comprised among the many honors of the venerable head of the House of Hapsburg, and Bukowina itself is one of the Crown lands of the Austrian Empire, sandwiched in between the Province of Galicia and the northwestern frontier of Rumania, among the southern spurs of the Carpathians. It is densely wooded with red-hued beech trees, from which, indeed, its name is derived, and is inhabited by a population which springs from the same stock as the Rumanians and speaks the same language, being descended from the Roman Emperor Trajan's Italian settlers in his Danubian colony of Dacia.

In olden times it was part and parcel of Moldavia, and for a prolonged period its City of Suczava was the capital of Moldavia. It then became an autonomous dependency of the Sublime Porte. When Empress Catherine II. declared war upon Turkey, in 1769, her troops seized Bukowina, but restored it to the Sultan on the conclusion of peace in 1774. In 1777 the Porte was induced to cede it to Austria, and ever since it has been a Crown land of the House of Hapsburg and a source of great revenue by reason of its immense salt mines at Kaczyka, the largest, richest, and oldest in the world.

So much for the Duchy of Bukowina, which for the last eight months has constituted one of the principal battle grounds of the warring armies of the Czar and of Emperor Francis Joseph. They have moved backward and forward through the duchy, like the ebb and flow of a sea—but of a sea the waters of which are not blue, but stained red with the human blood of untold thousands.

The same stretches of territory have been fought over again and again, and during the fray the unfortunate inhabitants have seen not only their property and their possessions destroyed but even the very trace of their homes obliterated by shot and shell and fire. Perhaps no portion of the Dual Empire has suffered more cruelly from the present war, and its starving, destitute people, hard working and thrifty, though illiterate, are even worse off and more worthy of pity and commiseration than the Belgians.

For whereas the latter have all along been within the reach of that American aid which has been so generously accorded, and have been in a measure shielded by the German invaders, not from motives of humanity, but from those of self-interest, the unfortunate Bukowinians are so remote from the United States and their duchy is to such an extent inaccessible under present conditions, that, even with the best of intentions, the Austrians and the Russians would alike find it difficult, if not impossible, to furnish the necessary means of conveyance of American relief to this stricken corner of the Carpathians.

Although a portion of Bukowina is held by the Russians, who have secured possession of the great salt mines, and the remainder is the scene of continual fighting, yet the Austrian civilian Governer, Count Rudolph von Meran, who had every excuse for leaving the duchy when it was invaded by the Russians, and for abandoning it to the Austrian military authorities, who had suspended all civil administration and justice for martial law, remained on at his post, devoting himself entirely to the task of relieving the distress and the destitution of the unhappy Bukowinians, with so much unselfishness as to win the admiration of friend and foe alike.

Perhaps the most striking proof of the manner in which he fulfilled his self-imposed task of mercy is the fact that the Russian commanders have made no attempt to arrest him or even to interfere with his work in any way, realizing that it is a work purely of humanity. Indeed, they have treated him with wonderful consideration, and in many instances have endeavered to facilitate his mission by intrusting him with the distribution of such food as could be spared from that required for the maintenance of the troops. As for Emperor Francis Joseph, he has signified his appreciation of the Count's activities by raising him to the rank of a member of his Privy Council and by bestowing upon him the Grand Cross of the Order of Leopold.

Count Rudolph von Meran is allied to Emperor Francis Joseph by ties of kinsmanship, for he is a grandson of Archduke John Sebastian, by the latter's marriage with the Tyrolese peasant girl, Anna Plochel, in 1827. Their marriage was one of the most popular romances of the reigning house of Austria-Hungary. In 1825 Archduke John Sebastian, at the time a bachelor of about forty years of age, was on his way from Vienna to Frankfort to preside, in the name of his cousin, Emperor Francis, over the deliberations of the Diet of the German Empire.

On arriving at the little village of Brandhofen, in Austrian Tyrol, in his traveling carriage, he found the necessary relay of horses but no postilion. The Archduke's arrival was totally unexpected and the postboy was therefore working in the fields at some place several hours distant. The Postmaster's daughter, Anna Plochel, knowing that her father would incur punishment, and probably dismissal, for his failure to provide a postilion for so important a personage as the cousin of the then reigning Emperor of Austria, immediately decided to undertake the duty of the missing postboy, arrayed herself in his habiliments, mounted man-fashion the off-horse of the imperial postchaise, and galloped off.

As Anna was a remarkably pretty girl the Archduke was attracted first to the features and then to the figure of his postilion, and at the end of the relay asked for an explanation. He was so much touched by the girl's devotion to her father that he interested himself in her behalf, caused her to be educated for the space of two years in a neighboring convent, and then married her morganatically, securing for her from the Emperor the title of Baroness von Brandhofen. On the accession of the present Emperor to the throne, in 1849, he advanced his uncle's peasant-born wife to the rank of Countess von Meran, with remainder to her son Francis, father of Count Rudolph von Meran, Governor of the Duchy of Bukowina.

The union between the Archduke and the Postmaster's daughter was a wonderfully happy one in every respect, and the village Countess bore herself with so much simplicity, modesty, and freedom from all affectation as to win the affection and regard of most of her imperial relatives, which she retained until her death at an advanced age, in 1885, the late Empress Elizabeth in particular frequently visiting her in her Tyrolese home.

This favor of the reigning house was continued to her son, who was created a Knight of the Order of the Golden Fleece, an honor ordinarily restricted to Princes of the blood, and to the most powerful nobles of the realm, but which has likewise been bestowed upon the present head of the Meran family, namely, Count Johann von Meran, elder brother of the Governor of Bukowina.

Another romance of the House of Hapsburg has just been brought to a close through the death at Munich of one of its most clean-lived, amiable, and popular members, who passed away in the Bavarian capital, with several Archduchesses at his bedside, all of whom, as well as several Archdukes, subsequently attended his funeral in the picturesque churchyard of Meran, that is to say, in the vicinity of his castle of Rothenstein, where he had made his home after his marrage.

A nephew of the Emperor, and youngest brother of Archduke Francis, who was murdered in last July at Serajevo, Archduke Ferdinand was third in the line of succession to the throne, when he abandoned all his rights to the throne, his prerogatives, and status as a Prince of the blood, his commission as Lieutenant General of the army, and his various military honors, in order to wed on a footing of perfect equality Berta Czuber, daughter of the universally respected Court Councilor and Professor of Mathematics of the University of Vienna, Emanuel Czuber.

Unlike the two other Archdukes who were forced to surrender their rights to the throne, and their rank as members of the reigning house of Austria-Hungary, on contracting marriages on a footing of equality with women who did not even belong to the aristocracy, Archduke Ferdinand forfeited neither the affection nor the good-will of his uncle, the Emperor. Nor was he exiled from the territories of the Dual Empire. Indeed, he contracted his marriage with Berta Czuber with the full sanction of the venerable sovereign, who bestowed upon him a large allowance from his privy purse. The Emperor also offered to bestow a nobiliary title upon the ex-Archduke and upon his consort. But this was declined by his nephew, who, in entire agreement with his wife, declared that, having given up his imperial status, he would prefer to remain a member of the same bourgeoisie as that to which his wife belonged and to be known as plain "Herr Ferdinand Burg."

The now widowed Frau Ferdinand Burg is a tall, blonde woman, who had been engaged to the Archduke for some ten years previous to their marriage. She had, however, manifested so much tact and discretion and kept to such a degree in the background, though a striking figure in her plain black but perfectly fitting dresses, that none save the few initiated were aware of the fact that she was the betrothed of Archduke Ferdinand, although there was a general impression that he was involved in some sort of a romance.

He never, however, gave cause for the slightest kind of scandal. His life was wholly free from reproach. He was not only a good soldier, but also a very clever one, being the only member of the imperial family who had specialized in military engineering, and he was extremely popular with his fellow-officers and the men under his command, by reason of his kindliness, his freedom from all hauteur, and his camaraderie. He was gifted, too, as a painter, and as a musical composer, and produced several operettas and waltzes, under the name of "Ferdinand Holzwart." He made the acquaintance of his wife while in garrison at Prague, at the time when her father was pro-

WHAT IS TO BE DONE WITH TURKEY?

Gustave Hervé, Well-Known French Socialist Editor, Says Constantinople Should Go to Russia and Rest Be Divided Up.

Widespread interest is being aroused by the war articles of Gustave Hervé, the famous French Socialist editor. Recently Hervé, whose hostility to the French Government in former years caused him to spend much time in prison, wrote an article in his paper, La Guerre Sociale, on how Poland should be divided up after the war, which was reproduced in THE NEW YORK TIMES. The articles translated below appeared in recent issues of Hervé's paper.

The French Censor objected to some of his statements and caused them to be eliminated when the proofs were submitted to him before publication, so that there are two small gaps in the portion dealing with Constantinople.

By Gustave Herve.

I.

IF one were to apply in letter and spirit the French principle of the sovereignty of peoples, which gives to them the right to shape their own destinies, it would be necessary to say to the various races of the Turkish Empire, once Constantinople were taken:

"You are free. How do you wish to govern yourselves? What independent nations do you wish to establish?"

At such a question most Turkish subjects would open their eyes wide with astonishment.

To them, the national idea is something so vague! Most of them have such a dim consciousness of their own nationality! And, when all is said and done, there is so little that is really national among them!

All of them are Levantines, inhabitants of the lands of the Levant. Our forefathers of the Middle Ages thought the Levant the end of the world; to them it was more mysterious and strange than the Far East is to us of today.

How many races are jumbled together under the appellation of "Levantines." There are Jews, Syrians, Arabs, Armenians, Greeks, Turks. If only they lived together in certain regions, one might distinguish modern nations in embryo, just as, when the Turks ruled the Balkans at the beginning of the nineteenth century, one could detect the germ of the little Greek, Serbian, Bulgarian, and Rumanian nations.

But in this case there is no such thing. Every big city is a salad of nationalities. Take Constantinople. It has 450,000 Turks, 200,000 Greeks, 150,000 Armenians, 60,000 Jews, 150,000 Europeans of all nations. These figures are only approximate, Turkish statistics being marvels of inaccuracy.

What could be more cosmopolitan than the city of Smyrna, with its 220,000 inhabitants—Greeks, Armenians, Jews, Turks, and Latins from France and Italy, vaguely called Franks? And there is the city of Beirut, with its population of 140,000, where all the races and religious sects of the Levant are flung pell-mell, to such a point that the Gods of the Mohammedans, of the Greeks, of the Armenians and of the Jews, would have all the trouble in the world to sort out their flocks.

If the European troops should be withdrawn after the destruction of the Turkish Empire, you would see the whole of the unfortunate Levant a prey to complete anarchy and Europe would be obliged to intervene again to restore order.

The best course under the circumstances in the interest of the Levantines themselves, as well as of European peace, is to apportion amicably among the victors all the territories of the Sultan, dividing them into zones of protectorate and influence. Each European nation profiting by thus succeeding to the Turkish Government should bind itself to respect the local autonomy and religion of its protégés and to make their political rights gradually equal to those of its own nationals.

If the Bulgarians take part in the war within a few days on the side of the Allies, who will dispute their acquisition of Adrianople and all of European Turkey as far as the Enos-Midia line, which they wrested from the Turks in 1912 and the Turks took back in 1913?

The coast of Asia Minor is largely Greek, as are also most of the neighboring islands. If M. Venizelos returns in time to power, and is backed by his country, who can refuse him these lands on which Hellenic genius has left such a strong imprint for two thousand years. But Greece must hurry if she wishes Smyrna, for it must have aroused the desires of plenty of others.

Since her last war against the Turks, Italy has kept twelve little Greek islands south of Smyrna, including Rhodes; it is understood that she would not be displeased at acquiring the south coast of Asia Minor, with the inland regions back of it. It is added that when she learned that Greece was sulking she cast very longing eyes toward Smyrna. Poor Bülow—he had nothing to offer Italy but the unfortunate Trentino, which, she knows, will come to her by force of circumstances in a few weeks, with Trieste into the bargain!

I do not think that the Allies will dispute the assumption by France of a protectorate over Syria and Palestine, with Damas, Aleppo, and Beirut. Since time immemorial this has been a zone of French influence. These regions have been under a vague sort of French protectorate since the sixteenth century. In 1862, in fact, an expedition was undertaken to save the Christians of Lebanon from being massacred by the Mohammedans of the neighborhood, since when there has been a Christian Government in Lebanon.

Throughout Syria the Jesuit fathers and the monks of other Christian sects have, through their schools, spread the French language in the entire region, and the schools of the French and Israelite Alliance have aroused affection for lay and republican France.

Would there be any objection if the French Republic turned over Palestine to those Jews who have preserved a consciousness of Jewish nationality and who dream of reconstructing on the lands of their fathers their country which was destroyed 2,000 years ago by the sword of a conqueror?

Armenia is that jumble of mountains and plateaus contiguous to Caucasian Russia. The Armenians, who belong to a separate Christian Church, have been persecuted to such a degree by their Turkish masters, especially by the Mohammedan mountaineers of their country, the Kurds, that they would look upon the formation of an autonomous Armenia, under the suzerainty of Russia, as a deliverance. I do not wish to contradict them.

As for our English friends, surely you would not have them cede their share to others. They will take Mesopotamia, with Bagdad and the main line of the great Bagdad Railway, which will be the most direct route to India, together, perhaps, with a protectorate over Arabia, and Mecca, the holy city. I ask you to believe that, no matter what happens, they will have no cause for complaint and will not receive, by any means, the smallest share.

Poor Turks! After this dismemberment all they will have left will be the interior of Asia Minor. There are three or four million Turkish peasants there, who are good and peaceful folk, and as I am not so cruel as to wish that the last shreds of their independence be taken from them, we shall—if diplomacy is willing—allow a little inoffensive Turkish nation to continue to exist in the heart of Asia Minor.

There remains Constantinople with its strait.

Who is to have this tidbit?

II.

CONSTANTINOPLE for whom?

For the Russians, by all means.

I know that this calm statement will exasperate more than one of my political friends. I am running directly counter to preconceived ideas. To all liberals and democrats of France and England it is a foregone conclusion that to give Constantinople to the Russians would be the abomination of desolation; that, simultaneously with such a step, Europe would become Cossack.

To keep from drinking that cup of bitterness do you know the ingenious scheme which they are letting simmer at the bottom of their hearts? It is this:

Constantinople is to be made a free international city and the strait is to be internationalized and neutralized. An international committee is to watch over this little neutral State; it will not tolerate any fortifications either on the Dardanelles or the Bosporus. In this way everybody will be happy.

The Russians who, by virtue of earlier treaties had not the right to send their fleet out of the Black Sea, will then be able to send it into the Mediterranean whenever they wish. Never again will the closing of the strait bottle up, at Odessa and Nicolaieff, the merchant vessels filled with grains for which the strait is the only exit.

And the Balkan States would also be satisfied. Of course, the Bulgarians would prefer to have Constantinople as a capital; so would Greece. But while waiting the fulfillment of their overambitious dreams, Constantinople, neutralized together with the strait, would permit them to continue cherishing their hopes for the future—and, anyhow, the menace of the Russian colossus would be eliminated.

So all would be for the best in the best of all possible worlds.

This solution of the problem has only one defect: Russia would not accept it.

(Here the censor has removed part of a paragraph, referring apparently to Russia's various attempts to get possession of Constantinople.)

If the Russians are not there it is solely, because throughout the nineteenth century France and England have prevented them. Now that they are the allies of France and England, now that France and England need them to crush Germany, and all the neutrals, Greeks as well as Bulgarians and Rumanians, are hesitating on the brink of war, can you hope, you who are the friends and allies of the Russians, to make them forego the prey that they covet so ardently?

If nobody but Russian diplomats cherished that dream one might possibly try to thwart its realization. But all the youth of Russia have been brought up with the idea that Constantinople is the goal of the entire foreign policy of Russia. Read what Russian papers are saying at this moment; liberal and democratic papers are in agreement with the conservative sheets. Not only the Russian Government, but the whole mass of Russian public opinion believes that Constantinople should be Russia's share of the spoils of Turkey.

Even the poor mujiks of Russia know in a confused way that Constantinople must belong some day to Holy Russia. They know very little, but they know quite well that on the day when the Turks entered Constantinople centuries ago this city was in the eyes of Christians of the true religion—meaning, of course, their own—the holy city, the Rome of the Orthodox Church, of which they are the most faithful of adherents. They even know that on the day when the Mohammedans entered the church of St. Sophia at Constantinople on horseback, killing every one in their path, there was an Orthodox priest praying beneath the sacred dome. When the infidels arrived a great miracle happened. The walls of the holy basilica suddenly opened, the holy priest entered, the walls closed about him. He is still there, and, on the day when the Christians recapture Constantinople, he will emerge to bless the Czar of Holy Russia and his faithful Orthodox followers. All of which is the proof, vouchsafed by Heaven, that Constantinople must become one of the holy cities of the true Church and of its temporal head, the Czar of all the Russias.

What is the meaning at bottom of all these legends, fostered by the Russian clergy; what is the meaning of that persistent Russian policy of working toward the realization of the dream of Peter the Great and Catherine II.?

What can it be except that possession of the strait is of vital interest to this nation which will soon have 200,000,000 inhabitants, and which can have no other outlet for its great agricultural and richest region?

In 1902 Turkey was at war with Italy. The strait was closed. Russia's grain could not leave the Black Sea. Almost immediately afterward Turkey went to war with the Balkan States. Again the strait was closed, again there was commercial ruin in Russia. And now her merchant vessels are bottled up once again!

It will be in vain to tell the Russians that when the strait is neutralized there can be no such bottling up.

(Here again the censor has stricken out part of a paragraph, which concludes "if they prefer to have the keys of their house in their pocket who can blame them?")

It may be that this would hardly meet the desires of the Balkan States, especially of those who want Constantinople for themselves. Perhaps the Russian peril would become more serious for them in case Russia should some day turn her power against them. But the danger for them, in such a case, would not be the occupation of Constantinople by the Russians. The danger is that Russia, with or without Constantinople, is a colossus with 200,000,000 inhabitants, whereas they are put pigmies.

As to the naval powers of the Mediterranean who have looked with apprehension for a long time on the possibility that the Russians might get Constantinople because, in so doing, Russia would become a Mediterranean naval power, how is it they do not see that, with or without Constantinople, the mere neutralization of the strait, by opening the Mediterranean to the Russian fleet, would make Russia a great Mediterranean power whether they wished it or not?

Instead of haggling with the Russians about Constantinople and trying to prevent the inevitable, free England and the French Republic ought rather to speak these simple words to a friendly and allied Government: "By allowing you to establish yourselves at Constantinople our people are giving you a token of confidence and friendliness. They feel sure that you, in return, will give to the liberal public opinion of the West those moral guarantees which will constitute, in Western eyes, the most splendid conquests of this war for the liberation of nations."

If a Russian Government really resuscitated Poland by granting it full autonomy, gave the Jews equal civil and political rights, declared broad political amnesty and, in accordance with the promises of October, 1905, made of the Duma a body really representing the Russian people, would you have the slightest objection to giving Constantinople to such a Government?

EUROPE

By William R. Fox.

THE kneels, beholding War, between Foul pests and famines, stalking by;
And sees her fields incarnadine;
Her cities flaming; black the sky!
Imploring hands she clasps on high;
"Great God, what does it mean?" her cry;
"Great God, what does it mean?"

Take heart, sad mother! soon ascends
For thee an Easter dawn, whose sun
Discerns where'er thy realm extends,
No hand uplifting sword or gun!
Dividing lines and loathings none!
Thy twenty nations shall be one,
And all their races friends!

The feverish pangs that on thee prey,
And torture now, are but the thrills
Of dying greeds and hates that slay
Each other—so the great God wills!
The sloughs of all thine ancient ills
Are failing with the bane that kills,
Foredoomed to pass away.

Then, glorious mother! round the girth
Of this, our globe, from pole to pole,
The peoples all who owe thee birth,
The children of thy flesh and soul,
Will joy to view thee grand and whole,
Around thy brows an aureole,
Amidst the league of earth!

snow squalls are disagreeable, but they alternate with moments of sunshine, and that is sufficient; one takes note of the sunshine alone. Everybody is in the open air; neatly dressed, the children in their new clothes walk back and forth and rest.

I would almost say they are content, if I did not see so many women and children in mourning; if I did not meet each moment groups of wounded out for a walk—wounded of all ages and from all branches of the military service, especially infantry, artillery, Alpine chasseurs, cuirassiers, African troops, Garibaldians, a few cavalry, and sailors. Some carry their arms in slings, or have their heads bandaged. Others walk with canes or crutches.

All are to be pitied, are they not? But they do not ask too much pity. None of them is tragic, often they are gay. They are satisfied, doubtless, to be alive. They are content with what they have. The soldiers on leave are quite numerous. They walk about with their families or sweethearts, or in little companies, with frank and healthy faces. There is no more any drunkenness.

Some leave the street cars or the subway to inspect the German flags and cannon in the Invalides. Others simply watch the Seine, more animated than ever with its multitude of barges aligned four or five deep along the quays, and the constant activity of the little boats which pass each other, and the tugs towing barges full of provisions, reassuring for our food supply. Even the boxes of the booksellers scattered along the quays near the Institute attract the saunterers as in normal times as well as the little carts of the flower merchants from the south, who offer, as in former years, their bouquets of violets, carnations, and mimosas.

The Place de la Concorde is quite lively; the schoolboy battalion of the 1916 class has just saluted the statue of Strassburg, which is always adorned with fresh wreaths.

People are walking up and down the avenue of the Champs Elysées.

However, automobiles, which are countless during the week, are not in evidence on Sunday and leave room for strollers. The aeroplanes, which on week days fly in numbers before my window, remain in the hangars today.

One of the attractions of the promenade is the early shrubbery, which is already becoming green and sets the example of confidence.

It is astonishing how marvelously well Paris is cared for. My street has been remacadamized, though quite far from the centre—what luxury! Would it have been done in time of peace? The avenues are sprinkled and swept as ordinarily; what is more, the ground around our shade trees is spaded; their Summer leafage is prepared for. Those which are withering are replaced. I ask myself if I am not dreaming! But no, decidedly Paris remains Paris. Many people are in the churches. A holiday is more painful than other days, for mothers who see youths busy about them while they lack knowledge of their own sons, or knowing, weep.

The churches are wide open to them; they go there to pray in silence and to meet each other. The religious feeling is always latent and responsive; souls that are most rebellious to clerical domination are perhaps most mystic, most exalted—in the same way that those who love peace best are the best prepared for sacrifice.

Even our polemics of the newspapers—if they have not entirely lost their venom and their perfidious insinuations—have at least lost their evil influence.

The most irritating subjects are discussed without ill-feeling, except perhaps the subject of the return to France by Caillaux, whose adversaries persecute him by all possible means to the point that he may suffer the same fate as Jaurès; those who claim to lead the Nationalists discuss the conditions of peace which they advocate, which in plain terms would make war eternal! Barrès allots to France the left bank of the Rhine and all the rest of Germany which might be desired. All those who favor war and believe in the efficacy and profits of war will never consent to a peace without clouds for the future.

Hervé replies to them in very sober language that we have had quite enough of German Pan-Germanists, and we do not wish to see their like in France; that after the war we wish peace and a permanent peace. All this, moreover, is written without troubling the general calm, I would almost say the extraordinary peace of mind of the public. We have better things to do than to quarrel among ourselves. Each man holds himself ready for important duties, for what is essential, and, above all, to aid in the national defense.

When the time comes to decide on the terms of peace I hope that France, which has never ceased to love peace, and which in spite of and even because of the war, clearly loves peace more than ever, will be on the side of justice and reason against the violent and foolish, just in the same manner that today she is wholly against the Germans. She will comprehend that if we yield to the temptation to abuse their defeat, the war will not be ended, but will only be suspended to begin again at the first opportunity. She will comprehend that we must make an absolute end of Prussian militarism, but that it is impossible to make an end of a people.

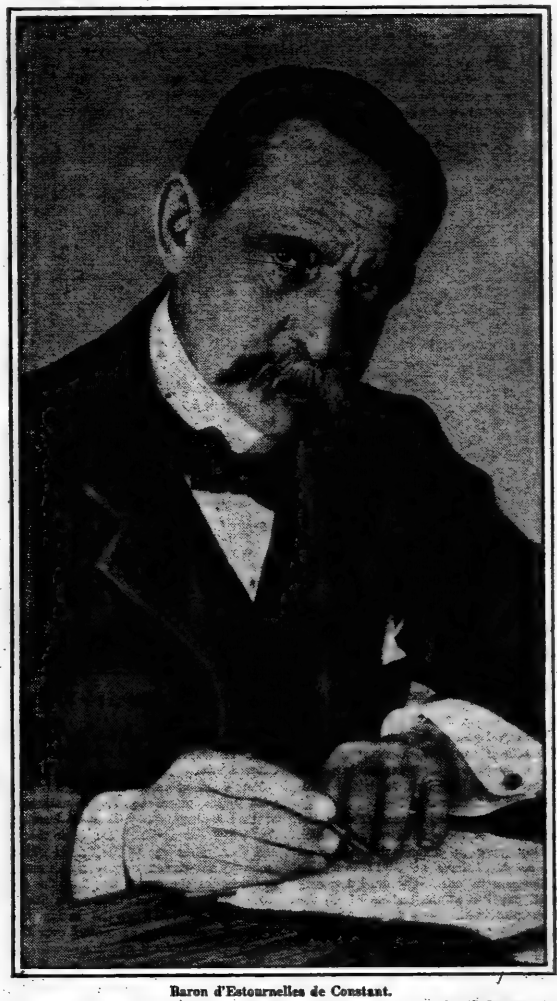
We anticipate serious trouble in France in this question, but I hope for the best. I have confidence in the wisdom we shall gain from our sufferings.

At Paris the most astonishing thing to me is the Parliament, which, of course, is as divided in opinion as ever, but nevertheless acts irreproachably. The Chamber of Deputies is perfect in behavior and very dignified, in spite of the badly restrained outbreaks of the chauvinists.

The Chamber begins to be popular. Among those of its members who have been killed are some who belonged to the most progressive parties, those who were most hostile to the law of military service for three years. No longer does any one dare to reproach them with an alleged lack of patriotism.

As for the Senate, it is beyond belief. My colleagues are old. I cannot be suspected of judging them with too great favor, since they have always opposed me more or less.

I was born in a class which they dislike. I was elected contrary to their methods and their prejudices. And nevertheless I admire them for their discipline and for the self-denial imposed upon them by the people whom they represent. With the élite of the Senate I take part in the sessions of the important Committee on Foreign Affairs. It is the committee, in fact, which at the proper time will take into consideration the treaty of peace. Many of its members have suffered personally, have been ruined and plunged into mourning. One would hardly notice it. They are the ones who would afford strength to the Government if signs of weakness should appear. They would inspire it with the will to go to the extreme limit, in order to make a permanent end of war, in order not to disappoint the nation and the world with an imperfect and precarious peace.



Baron d'Estournelles de Constant.
(Copyright Paul Thompson.)

The committee is enthusiastic for the expedition to the Dardanelles. It seem there rightly an action without precedent which promises incalculable results. Its thirty-six members have unanimously understood and affirmed the necessity of carrying this enterprise to a successful conclusion in order to gain an additional and irresistible impetus toward peace. What a change this is from the past! And the various diplomatic bodies do not hesitate. There is perfect agreement among all the French, as among the Russians and the English, in face of the astounded Balkan nation, that the eternal problem must be solved once for all.

German militarism has worked the miracle of bringing about a holy union between France, England, and Russia. It has reconciled hostile forces within these nations. But most remarkable of all, it forces us to solve the question of the Orient. This curse of pan-Germanism has one good effect in that it unites the entire world, except the neutrals, to protest against its crimes.

German militarism will have even disciplined the English suffragettes, which is not the least of its miracles. In this, too, I see a new symptom of progress. Up to the present time we have all presented this argument against the feminist propaganda: "You do not fight; therefore in time of peace you may not claim the same rights as men, for you have not the same duties." This argument no longer carries weight. On the contrary, the war will furnish to the suffragettes a new and perhaps most potent argument. They will retort: "We have done our duty doubly; we have protested during peace and for peace, but we have served during the war."

They have not limited themselves to urging their husbands, brothers, sons, and fiancés to take up arms against German militarism. They have themselves volunteered by thousands. Their work in the war will prove of high value, because in our ordinary affairs they will carry on those forms of work which they perform already in preference to men. They will be excellent telephone and telegraph operators, weighers, accountants, nurses, chauffeurs, &c. Their courage and devotion are undoubted.

In all the countries, in all the armies of the belligerents, Germany included, the value of the services rendered by women during the war cannot be estimated, but, after the war, when the spirit of custom will try to oust them, it will fail, in the same way that it has been nonplused by the heroism of the so-called anti-militarists who have fought against war during times of peace, but who are unanimous in the determination to conquer in the war which has been forced upon us.

Great changes will result from this war. We were not wrong when we warned the Conservatives, and when we said to them "Take care! War will bring nothing but trouble to you. For you more than for any others it will be a bad business. All the world will pay the penalty in sacrifice and irreparable losses, but in addition the rich will necessarily bear the heavier portion of the burden of taxation and reform."

With a little foresight and energy, with a little confidence and devotion, these reforms might have been made at small cost, without the necessity of such a war.

But all that is retrospective. As a matter of fact, we accept our mourning, suffering, and ruin, and we will accept them to the end, provided that civilization profit thereby, and that German militarism disappears from the face of the earth.

In this merciless war, where, democrats and autocrats, we fight beside our allies for the existence of the small nations, and consequently for the rights of neutrals, perhaps the saddest thing is that the neutrals themselves, in fear of being compromised or impoverished, try to maintain a balance between the strong and the weak, between the German armies and the people of Belgium, between the invader and the invaded, between violence and justice. By abandoning each other and their own cause the neutrals, we are told, seek a means of appeasing the monster, and at need they nourish him with their wheat in order to save their commerce and their ships.

What shipwreck! More irremediable than that of all their merchant fleets! The voluntary shipwreck of their faith in the treaties which they have signed—the shipwreck of their vows!

THE RECKONING

By W. C. Smith.

WHAT will the reckoning be,
When the fortress falls,
And the last dreadnought of the sea
Looms silent by shot-scared walls?
When the last long line of men have faced
the guns and died,
When the last beautiful death-winged bird is tied,
When the lust for blood and the maw of greed lies satisfied,
What will the reckoning be?

O dreamer, yea with lowered head;
O mother, there beside your cherished dead;
O trooper, long by bloody butchers led,
What will the reckoning be?

What will the reckoning be?
Bugles to cease—
To other, statues there beside the sea
To butchery well done.
And empty stools beside a lonesome cottage hearth,
And misery and want and woe where once
was mirth,
The awful aftermath of war upon the earth.

fessor at the university there, and was a frequent guest there at the Czuber family table.

Ferdinand avoided publicity as far as possible after his marriage, and only came to the fore on one occasion, namely, at the funeral of his eldest brother, Archduke Francis, at Artstetten, overlooking the Danube, last Summer, being present by the special invitation of his uncle, the Emperor. Garbed as a civilian, and in deep mourning, he took his place, not among the Princes of the blood and dignitaries of the empire, following the hearse, but beside his stepmother, the widowed Archduchess Maria Therese, and his two sisters, the Archduchesses Maria Annunciata and Elizabeth Amelia, the latter married to Prince Aloys Liechtenstein, and his aunt, Duchess Charles Theodore of Bavaria, widow of the so celebrated oculist brother of the late Empress of Austria.

In spite of the many Princes and Princesses of the reigning house of Austria who supported his widow, Frau Ferdinand Burg, at the funeral; in spite, too, of the beautiful floral tribute bearing an autograph inscription to the effect that it was a token of affection to a dearly loved nephew from the old Emperor, no official cognizance whatsoever was taken at Vienna of the demise and of the obsequies of Ferdinand Burg, nor were any military honors rendered at his funeral.

For he had to such an extent ceased to be a Prince of the blood, and had so completely descended to the rank of the bourgeoisie, that no mention of his name will be found in the official list of the members of the sovereign House of Hapsburg in the current issue of the Almanach de Gotha and of other standard works of reference. His name had, since his marriage, as completely disappeared therefrom as if he had departed from the land of the living for full four years prior to his actually succumbing a fortnight ago to an affection of the heart brought on by muscular rheumatism and phlebitis.

I may add that Frau Burg inherits her husband's private fortune, his town house at Munich, and his castle and estates at Meran, in addition to which the Emperor has intimated to her his intention of continuing to her the handsome allowance which he accorded to his nephew Ferdinand. No children were born to the union, which was one of wholly unclouded happiness.

Less fortunate than Archduke John Sebastian and Archduke Ferdinand was the late Archduke Henry. For when in 1868 he married, without the consent of his cousin the Emperor, the popular Viennese actress Leopoldine Hofmann, he was banished from the Dual Empire, and it was only four years later that, on the birth of their only child, Marie Raineria, at Lucerne, the Emperor, at the instance of his consort, Empress Elizabeth, relented sufficiently to bestow upon Leopoldine Hofmann the title of Baroness von Waideck, which was likewise to be borne by her daughter.

Archduke Henry and his wife and child continued to make their home in Switzerland, and it was not until 1891 that a complete reconciliation was brought about between Henry and Emperor Francis Joseph through the intervention of Empress Elizabeth, who was the most kind hearted of women. On the invitation of the Emperor, Archduke Henry arrived in Vienna, with his wife and daughter, after an absence of nearly twenty years from the capital, and took up their residence in the Hotel Sacher. The Archduke visited the Emperor within a few hours after his arrival, at the Hofburg, receiving from him not only a full and complete pardon, but also the restoration of all his honors and dignities. The interview between the two cousins was most cordial.

But it was the last that ever took place. For on the following morning Archduke Henry was seized with a violent attack of illness, and a few hours later his wife was likewise prostrated thereby. The sufferings of the Archduke and the Baroness were very brief, and on the same evening they succumbed within an hour of one another, leaving their only child, the pretty eighteen-year-old Marie, an orphan and alone in the hotel.

The suddenness of her parents' death, the loneliness of the young girl, who was without any relatives on her mother's side, and whose bereavement was rendered doubly cruel by the fact that it occurred at the very moment when brighter prospects seemed to be opening up to the little family, after their many years of exile, aroused universal sympathy, nowhere more so than among her imperial relatives. Archduke Henry's brother, Rainer, at once came forward with his wife, and, being childless, gave her a home beneath his roof, and adopted her as their daughter, while the Emperor settled upon her a large sum of money, at the same time creating her a Countess of Waideck in her own right.

A year later Marie contracted, with the consent of the Emperor and with that of her adopted parents, the kindly Archduke and Archduchess Rainer, a marriage with the Duke della Grazzia, Prince of Campofranco, who, like herself, has royal blood in his veins, for his father was the offspring of the royal French Duchesse de Berry by her second marriage.

It may be recalled that this daughter of the King of the Two Sicilies, after the murder of her husband, the Duc de Berry, son of Charles X. of France, at the opera in Paris, contracted a secret marriage with an Italian diplomat of ancient family, the Marquis Lucchesi-Pali. By him she had a numerous family, her eldest son by this union being, therefore, half-brother of the French Prince in whose favor his grandfather, Charles X., abdicated the French throne in 1830, and who reigned as a child for about twenty-four hours as Henry V. Subsequently known as the Duc de Bordeaux, hailed by the Royalists of France as their lawful sovereign, he died in Austria as the Comte de Chambord.

Archduke Rainer passed away last year, leaving a considerable portion of his enormous fortune to his niece and adopted child Marie, Duchesse della Grazzia, and she will receive a still further addition to her wealth on the death of her aunt, the aged widow of Archduke Rainer. She divides her time with her husband and her now 20-year-old daughter between her beautiful places at Brunnsee, in Styria, and at Botzen, in Tyrol, while her Winters are mostly spent in her magnificent palace of Vendramini, on the Grand Canal in Venice.

Still another romance of the House of Hapsburg, which has attracted very little attention abroad, was the quiet marriage three years ago of Archduchess Eleanor, daughter of Archduke Charles Stephen, to an officer of her father's steam yacht, Lieutenant Alphons von Kloss of the Imperial Austrian Navy. The union was contracted with the full consent of the Emperor, and with that of the Archduchess's parents, and has turned out very well indeed. The Archduchess, who was not called upon to sacrifice her imperial rank and status, but only her place in the line of succession to the crown, makes her home entirely at Pola, on the shores of the Adriatic, and has not been seen at the Court of Vienna since some months prior to her wedding. Her father is the sailor member of the reigning house of Austria and a brother of the Queen Mother of Spain and of Archduke Frederick, the Generalissimo of the Austrian Army.

If Archduke Leopold Salvator, and his sister, Archduchess Louise, were deprived of their membership of the imperial House of Hapsburg, and of all their rights and prerogatives as such, and have been, moreover, exiled from the Dual Empire, it is because the mesalliances which they contracted, in defiance of the prohibition of the Emperor, were attended by a series of the most unsavory scandals. These have received so much publicity in the American press that they do not need anything more than passing reference here.

Archduke Leopold Salvator, who bore a most unpleasant reputation even before he forfeited his rank, and who was to a great extent an object of ostracism on that account, married, first, a Viennese variety showgirl, whom he then divorced. After that he contracted another marriage, with a chambermaid of a second-class Munich hotel, who now in her turn is suing him for maintenance and desertion. He bears the name of Leopold Wolfling, and has secured naturalization as a citizen of Switzerland.

His sister Louise, while still Crown Princess of Saxony, eloped with her children's Belgian tutor to Switzerland, where she had herself photographed with him in the most shameless fashion for the illustrated newspapers and then, after all sorts of "adventures," one more discreditable than the other, married the Florentine pianist, Toselli, from whom she is now judicially separated. She has still further aroused the indignation of her royal and imperial relatives by the publication of a singularly scurrilous book, in which she endeavored to hold the reigning houses of Austria and of Saxony, as well as all of her other royal and imperial relatives, up to the obloquy of the world. She bears the title of Countess Montignoso.

This brief sketch would not be complete without the mention of the missing Archduke John Salvator, the exact causes of whose exile from Austria, deprivation of Austrian citizenship, and compulsory abandonment of his rank and titles, as well as of his place in the line of succession to the throne, still remain shrouded to this day in as great a mystery as that which envelops his ultimate fate. It is generally understood that he laid himself open to charges of high treason against the Imperial Government, in connection with certain ambitious intrigues in the Balkans, which proved a source of no end of trouble to the Emperor.

The fact remains that it was only several weeks after his exile had commenced and after his abandonment of the titles and status of an Archduke for that of plain John Orth had become public that he married, in London, Marguerite Stubel, a Viennese actress. That he was deeply in love with her it is difficult to believe. Certainly his letters written at the time of his marriage, copies of which I have before me, do not convey that idea. Quite the contrary.

It may be recalled that, purchasing a sailing ship, he sailed with his wife for La Plata. He safely reached the latter place, where most of his crew deserted him, on account of the eccentricity which he had displayed on the voyage across the Atlantic. He got together at La Plata a scratch crew, recruited from the scum of the port, sailed thence in 1891 for Valparaiso, via the Strait of Magellan, and has never been heard of since.

BARON DE CONSTANT ON FRANCE

He Discusses the Effects of the War on Various Phases of the National Life.

The letter which is herewith presented was written recently in Paris by Baron d'Estournelles de Constant, Senator of France, to Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler. Through the courtesy of Dr. Butler, THE NEW YORK TIMES is enabled to give the letter to its readers.

By Baron d'Estournelles de Constant.

EACH day death claims new victims among us. The best of our young men are the ones chosen.

Many have been killed and we know some who have been wounded many times in seven months. Many of the wounded who were cured at Créans sent us regular reports, like children, but now they no longer give signs of life; the packages which we sent them to alleviate the hardships of life in the trenches are sent back to us in lieu of letters, which proves, alas, too clearly that they no longer have need of anything.

However, a letter from one of these young men whom we had believed to be lost was received recently, but the letter was dated from a city in the south of France, from a hospital where he lies wounded anew.

The son of my sister, Mme. de Saint Gervais, is recovering; the war has strengthened him; tomorrow he will be stronger and healthier than heretofore.

He is not content to exist; he lives in full measure and it is both beautiful and sad to see this youth depart again to face the same perils. May he not meet the fate of his cousin, the son of my other sister, Mme. Maspéro. Hardly recovered from his wounds, he returned to the firing line two weeks ago. He took his place again in the same trench before which he had fallen three months previously. He wrote to his mother when he arrived at his post; since then she has been entirely without news from him. Today I am informed that he has been killed.

How shall I break the sad news to his mother? His death is a terrible misfortune for the family, and still more so for the nation and for science. He was a young savant, son of a great savant.

Yesterday there lay before him a glorious future which today is only a memory. It is to be feared that his father, who is aged and seriously ill, may not survive this sorrow. Every day I hear of similar losses; young Chevillon, Deputy from Marseilles, the son of Denys Cochin, Deputy from Paris; the sons of Pierre Leroy Beaulieu and of Joseph Reinach have been killed—and how many others! My brother-in-law, Dr. Albert Robin, telephones me that his son André, Captain of Infantry, has been seriously wounded.

And all this time the Germans are finishing the Cathedral of Rheims! In a single day they have fired 1,500 shells into that unfortunate city. They imagine that they are crushing us. They send us messengers, neutrals, pretended friends to spy out our state of mind, looking for the time to propose peace to us.

Thus I received a visit from the former American Senator Beveridge, who had spent a month with his friends in Germany, whence he brought to us, quite inappropriately, all the time-worn and well-known themes against the Russian alliance. He has just now discovered the anomaly of that alliance between a democracy and an autocracy. He forgets that the repeated threats of the Pan-Germanists have forced us into the arms of Russia. In face of the present crisis of what avail is discussion with regard to major force and legitimate defense?

I have simply replied to him that we were forced into the war and that sacrifices no longer count with us. The more we have wished for peace, so much the more will we fight those who have made it impossible. It is not I alone, it is all France which speaks thus; and if every day I see the sufferings which my country accepts, I see equally that in her eyes these sufferings represent the price of peace. The more she will suffer, the less will France be willing to have suffered so much for nothing.

All the crimes of German militarism will react against itself; it is digging its own grave while it believes that it is crushing us. It leaves us no alternative other than to crush it or to disappear ourselves.

But for a country where for centuries the energies of all the Old World have gathered and grown together, to disappear is impossible. On the other hand, militarism is only a system, an extraordinary machine, but a machine which has served its time. At Créans and in the provinces, I was in a good position to estimate the inexhaustible resources which remain to France, inured to suffering by all her endless wars of the past, beginning with the Hundred Years' War; but in Paris I see still better her true strength, her sacred fire, and her confidence in the future, confidence impalpable as the morning breeze, but which would revive the dying.

This confidence is in the air, in the eyes of the passers, and even in inanimate objects; I cannot explain it; only a hostile stranger would be insensible to it. Yet it is everywhere in the smallest details of our life.

For example, today is Sunday. Well, it is simply a usual Sunday. The weather, moreover, is not good; the ish, and their expressions were never of anger, but only of profound regret that one of our States should have adopted toward their nation a policy of offensive discrimination.

"There can be no question of the profundity of Japanese gratitude for the services which we in the past have rendered them. We introduced Japan to the outside world. They regarded us as their sponsor in the court of nations.

"Suddenly they felt that we had slapped them in the face.

"They did not understand.

"But even in the face of their bewilderment I did not find them resentful. They were grieved and hurt.

"That Japan has not been more resentful is proof of a great restraint, of an admirable reserve upon the part of both her people and her Government.

"A part of this undoubtedly is due to their remembrance of our friendship of the past, a part of it is due to the Oriental capacity to bide their own time.

"The Japanese are a very proud people. They have a tremendous sense of national loyalty; they have grown in strength, and their adaptation and development of modern civilization has been perhaps the greatest marvel of the modern world.

"They prevailed amazingly in their war with Russia, and we cannot expect them to go on forever in their endurance of treatment which they feel is, and which actually is unworthy of them.

"It is desirable above most things for us to be at peace with all the world. I do not mean that I would willingly indorse a national course which would reduce us to a condition similar to that of China, rendering us incapable of defending ourselves from aggression.

"But I maintain that the last thought any good American should tolerate should be the thought of any war for which blame in the sense of moral responsibility could be attached rightfully to us.

"I think, however, that we have today a responsibility toward Mexico much like that which we rightfully acknowledged concerning Cuba, and it is my belief that we may have to do with Mexico what we did with Cuba."

At this point in the conversation I interrupted Mr. Wickersham to explain the plan which Henry Ford had suggested to me in Detroit a week or two ago—the sending down to Mexico of commercial and agricultural missionaries for the purpose of assisting the misguided population toward a realization of the superiority of peace over war.

"Mr. Ford's suggestion," said Mr. Wickersham, "is that of a kindly and wise man. There can be no doubt that this plan would have been the most desirable, the wise and possible plan a few years ago. But I do not believe it to be a practicable plan now.

"With regard to Mexico, also, we have made a grievous mistake. We have let things there run into anarchy and we must recognize this error, I believe, before the European war is over, or suffer in accordance with its magnitude.

"When Europe has the opportunity to turn its attention from warfare on its own continent to consideration of the destroyed and endangered properties of its citizens in Mexico, I fear that our opportunity for an effective and quick settlement of the Mexican situation according to the tenets of the Monroe Doctrine and the highest humanitarian ideals may have passed.

"To my mind the ineffective intervention we attempted was a mistake. Practically it amounts to about this: We made ourselves responsible for Mexican conditions, and then ran away from that responsibility."

"Suppose I definitely ask you exactly what you would do, if you had the Mexican affair in charge?" I suggested.

Mr. Wickersham smiled. "Today," he answered, "I can more readily say what I would not have done. Accepting the situation as it is, I find your question very difficult to answer without having at hand information which is not at my disposal, but which the Government at Washington must have.

"In general I think the Government of the United States must begin to feel some weighty sense of its obligation to stop the destruction of life and property and the slaughter of men which has been going on in Mexico.

"I see no way in which that object can be accomplished save by the occupation of the strategical places in Mexico by the military and naval forces of the United States; not for the purpose of making war, but for the purpose of restoring peace.

"I believe that the process we should have to follow, in the achievement of this end, would be in some sense analogous to that which we followed in similar work in Cuba and the Philippines.

"The object to be achieved is exactly the same as that which we had to attain in Cuba: the abatement of an international nuisance and menace.

"Accompanying our operations should be, I think, some declaration similar in purport to the joint resolution of Congress, adopted April 20, 1898, which announced, with respect to Cuba, that we had no intention of assuming permanent sovereignty, but that, on the other hand, we intended to withdraw as soon as the object of our intervention had been accomplished.

"The Mexicans are a wonderful people. Porfirio Diaz had Mexico pacified. If, having achieved this, he had but recognized the possibilities of his great nation and admitted into a share in the Government men who would have worked toward its development in the interest of the whole people rather than toward its exploitation for private benefit there never would have been a Madero uprising.

"Diaz made the mistake of ruling Mexico with an iron hand—we have made the mistake of letting Mexico get out of hand completely.

"I by no means mean that we should forthwith make war on Mexico. There is no need for making war on Mexico. But we must not abandon Mexico to the mistakes and corruption of those of her own leaders who see an opportunity for personal enrichment and glorification in a continuation of their present tactics of destruction of the lives and properties of their own countrymen, and of foreigners who have gone within their boundaries to invest and work.

"Law and order in Mexico can come only through the intelligent use of the power of the United States toward the establishment of a good government there, capable of managing its own affairs.

"The situation is not at all analogous to those conflicts of race ambition or those struggles between autocracy and democracy, or to any other of the irreconcilable conflicts which are at the bottom of the present European war.

"Happily the Americas are free from all those temptations and all those conflicting ambitions which have made a shambles of Europe, and it seems to me that the way in which a future free from such things best may be achieved, must lie in putting down conditions of anarchy, in the imperfectly civilized territory lying to the southward of us, and so related to us by proximity that we must accept a moral responsibility for its condition.

"Our position at this time is especially important, because at any moment we may be called upon to meet an unannounced opportunity to help toward peace in Europe. Despite the irritation existing against us in all European countries, which is inseparable from our necessarily neutral attitude, they all know that we have no axe to grind in relation to the European conflict.

"It is therefore highly probable that the moment may not be far distant when we may be able to serve in bringing the warring nations together upon some basis of settlement.

"This makes it especially desirable that we shall leave nothing undone which would indicate our incompetence to handle delicate situations well upon this continent."

U.S. SHOULD BUY LOWER CALIFORNIA

So Believes Jacob H. Schiff, Who Recently Visited the Pacific Coast--The Reasons Why.

The article which follows appeared in The San Francisco Argonaut of April 24, and is reprinted here because of its general interest.

LONG ago it was said of Benjamin Franklin that such was the temper of his mind, such his practical wisdom, that he could not go a day's journey by stage coach, or sail across the English Channel, without making observations of benefit to mankind.

This remark is called to mind in connection with the visit to California of Jacob H. Schiff, the eminent international financier. Mr. Schiff recently spent a month in California, dividing his time pretty evenly between the southern and central districts of the State. His visit was one of recreation, yet he came naturally into contact with leading men of affairs in every community, and he found time to formulate judgments both definite and wise concerning many things which through their very familiarity make small impression upon our own people.

In the course of his visit Mr. Schiff discussed wisely many of our interests and problems. Among other things, and perhaps most important of all, he has set forth his views with respect to that part of Mexico which lies immediately south of California—the long tongue of land known as Lower California.

This territory, Mr. Schiff pointed out, ought to be acquired by the United States. His argument is convincing. The detachment of Lower California as related to Mexico, he pointed out, renders it of little value to that country. From Mexico it may be reached only by a water route or by a roundabout journey through United States territory. It produces little or nothing, and has as related to Mexico small value of any kind. It is rather a source of trouble than of profit.

The United States, on the other hand, owing to the relationship which the Colorado River bears to the Imperial Valley, which lies almost wholly north of the international boundary, would gain large benefits through the acquisition of Lower California.

This statement calls for explanation: The Imperial Valley is truly an imperial territory. It comprises an area of tillable land aggregating some 750,000 acres. Of this area approximately one-third, or 250,000 acres, is under cultivation. Water sufficient to irrigate two-thirds of this area—possibly the whole of it—may be drawn from the Colorado River.

But here there arises a serious problem. The Colorado, after passing the international boundary in its flow toward the Gulf of California, has abandoned its original channel and flows into a sink known as Volcano Lake; and from Volcano Lake its natural flow is not southward to the gulf, but northward through the Imperial Valley and into the Salton Sink. There has been constructed across the northern end of Volcano Lake a mudbank or dam by which the waters are restrained and carried to a level which artificially forces the overflow southward into the gulf.

The sole protection of the Imperial Valley is this mud dam at the northern end of Volcano Lake. To make the Imperial Valley secure calls for two large constructive enterprises—(a) an enlargement of the Volcano Lake dam, estimated to cost, this year and next, approximately $1,000,000; (b) construction of a permanent restraining work at the point where the Colorado leaves its original channel and flows toward Volcano Lake, estimated to cost in the neighborhood of $2,000,000.

These constructions are too vast for private enterprise. They demand resources which the Government alone would be able to supply. That the Government would build these works is a practical assurance except for one fact, and that fact is a very serious one. The site of the Volcano Lake dam, likewise the site of the necessary restraining works on the Colorado River, lie in Mexican territory. The lands to be protected are American territory, and the points at which the projected constructions must be carried out are upon foreign soil and outside the jurisdiction of the United States Government.

Nothing is more certain than that, left to the course of nature, the Imperial Valley must ultimately be overwhelmed by the overflow waters of the Colorado River. So great is the volume of silt carried by this river that each season marks a distinct rise in the bottom level of the lake. Engineers observing the progressive rise in the lake and noting the inadequacy of the existing dam easily calculate the time when in the normal course of events the lake must break through the barrier and flow northward over the fields of the Imperial Valley. An exceptional flood might at any time work this tremendous mischief.

The value of the Imperial Valley is practically incalculable. Speaking broadly, it contains an area of cultivated or cultivable territory equal to all that region which lies between the Tehachapi Mountains and the international boundary. Its development has in a sense only just begun; its possibilities are prodigious. Every consideration that appeals to national interest, and to sympathy with an already large and energetic community, may be urged in behalf of the enterprises essential to local conservation.

As we have already said, Lower California is of little or no value to Mexico. If in that country there were a government controlled in its policies by considerations of common sense it would unquestionably be more than willing for a reasonable compensation to cede to the United States a territory in its own possession valueless, but in that of the United States of very great value.

Two practical difficulties lie in the way of a consummation thus supported by many sound arguments. First of all, there is now no government in Mexico qualified to make such a transfer. Second, there is a clause in the Mexican Constitution preordaining that anybody, with or without official authority, who may transfer any part of the national territory to another country, shall be guilty of high treason. But for this last-named restriction it is probable that before now offer of the territory of Lower California would have been made to the United States.

Usually, when there are great and obvious occasions, ways may be found to do by extra-legal processes acts technically in conflict with established law. There is not in Mexico such profound respect for constitutional limitations as to stand forever a bar against a transfer justified by a multitude of sound reasons and opposed by none.

Mr. Schiff, regarding the matter in all its aspects, declared himself as not without hope that a consummation so devoutly to be wished from every standpoint may be brought about. His judgment should have weight with both countries. It ought to stir in our people a lively sense of a great national necessity; and it ought, if there shall arise in Mexico any authority competent to be dealt with, to promote willingness to consider proposals looking to the transfer of Lower California to the United States.

At the very least, Mr. Schiff's understanding of a serious situation and his recommendations of a project of distinct national advantage ought to have weight in promoting some solution of a great and pressing problem. Somehow, in some way, the Government should arrange for the protection of the threatened Imperial Valley. If there be no authority in Mexico with which we may deal, then the Government of the United States ought to take the matter in hand upon its own initiative, put in the necessary protective works, leaving final adjustments with Mexico to be made when that country shall have attained an era of peace.

JAPAN AND MEXICO BIG PROBLEMS

Former Attorney General of the United States George W. Wickersham, Discusses Our Relations to Both Countries

By Edward Marshall.

JAPAN wants to be our friend, not our enemy, and that friendship should be secured for all time by some Congressional action which will force the people of the nation, which means the people of the various States and the Legislatures of the various States, to respect the terms of national treaties—that is the burden of a very important statement made to me by Hon. George W. Wickersham, lately Attorney General of the United States, the other day.

In Mexico it may be our duty to establish real police power, treating her somewhat as we treated Cuba after the Spanish War.

If we do not do this we may find ourselves, after the European war has ended, with a good deal of trouble on our hands, including many European lives and millions of dollars' worth of European property to answer for. That, also, is the opinion of the man who recently held the high position of chief legal adviser to our Federal Government.

"I am not a peace at any price man," Mr. Wickersham declared. "I will not say that my belief is that war is to be avoided under all conceivable circumstances.

"I do see, however, every reason in the war in Europe to make Americans anxious to keep out of war and the vast waste which general and continual military expenditure must entail. But there are some things which we must consider very carefully.

"Was it not Lowell who said that it is man's perdition to be safe when for truth he ought to die? Every good American believes that as heartily as he believes that peace with honor is to be desired above most things.

"There has been no war talk in the United States since our armed dispute with Spain save that which has concerned Japan and Mexico.

"I cannot conceive of any set of circumstances likely to arise which would justify an armed conflict between this country and Japan.

"I, myself, visited Japan two years ago, and chanced to be there just at the time when the California controversy was most acute. It was my good fortune to come into contact in Japan with men of all classes, among them members of the Government and others of the most highly educated and otherwise most eminent classes.

"Certainly I found among these men no hint of anything which possibly could be construed as enmity to this country. More than one assured me, honestly, I am certain, that they regarded the United States as the best of Japan's friends, and that the action of the California Legislature had come upon them as a slap in the face from a teacher and companion might come upon an individual.

"These men did not know then and they do not know now why the people of California suddenly began to exhibit such marked antagonism toward them. They were bewildered.

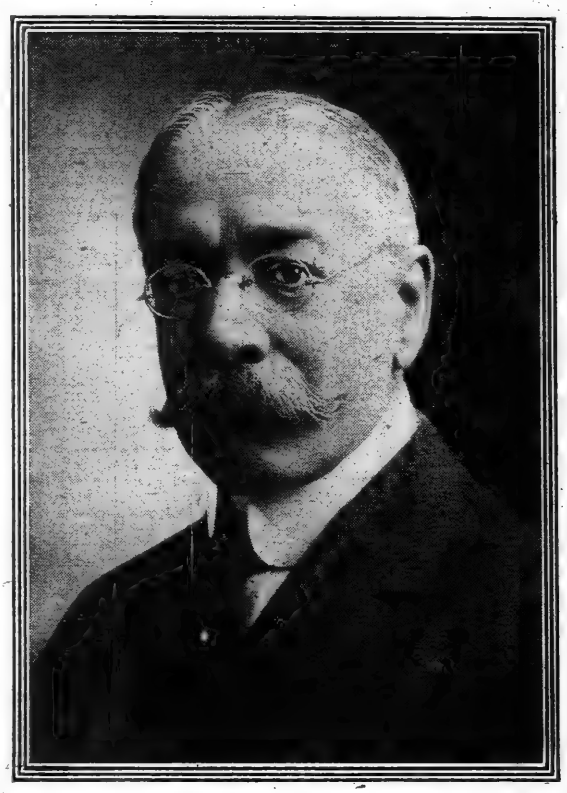
"Through all the period of extreme animosity upon the part of the newspapers of California, not a person whom we met in Japan showed us anything but extreme courtesy.

"The fact that I had previously held a portfolio in the American President's Cabinet was accepted as a reason for treating me with noteworthy politeness, although the necessity for so doing was not actual.

"I was merely on a pleasure trip around the world, but I was shown substantially all the consideration which could have been extended me had I been the nation's guest.

"My analysis of the attitude of California toward the Japanese leads me to believe that two causes are at the bottom of it.

"One of these is economic. The Japanese farmer and laborer came to this continent from a country accustomed to intensive cultivation of land, long hours of labor patiently and tirelessly fulfilled. Naturally he was prepared to pursue the same course here without protest and even without dissatisfaction.



Former Attorney General G. W. Wickersham.

"This led him to the introduction here of habits of work which instantly made him a dangerous and unpleasant competitor of the resident American business man and laborer.

"I think we may accept this as the root cause of the dislike of him which quickly grew up among the people of the coast. I have no doubt that this willingness to work very hard for very small pay lies at the bottom of all the antagonism which now exists, although with perfect honesty some citizens of the coast now ascribe other origins to their dislike of the Japanese.

"There is one other cause which I think also has had its influence on the matter, and that is the color question. It may be that we are more sensitive than others to prejudice against those of a color different from our own.

"We have ten millions and more people of African descent already in this country and we have found their presence here a serious complication in our national life.

"Their enfranchisement after the civil war has given rise to difficulties that all thoughtful men recognize as serious. Perhaps in this may have originated the widespread feeling which undoubtedly exists that we ought not to again add to the complexity of our electorate by giving the franchise to more people of other than the Caucasian race.

"The two causes I have mentioned, I take it, may be accepted as explaining whatever feeling exists against the Japanese in this country.

"Of course, however, the discriminatory legislation which has been enacted against them by the California Legislature has been offensive to those at whom it is aimed and to their nation. It would be unreasonable to expect otherwise.

"Already I have said that I feel not the slightest fear that the two countries ever will be involved in war; but I believe the obligation of restoring the very friendly feeling toward us which at one time existed in the hearts of the Japanese people rests upon us, not upon the Japanese.

"I feel that we must come to recognize through Congressional action our national responsibility for the inviolability of treaties which the nation has entered into.

"As a nation we cannot make a treaty with Japan guaranteeing the nationals of that country like treatment here to that which our nationals are given there, and then, when one of the States which make up our nation violates that treaty, say that we are sorry, but that the error, having been committed by a State, cannot be corrected by the nation, because the nation has no control over the States which make it up.

"You see, a foreign nation cannot negotiate with one of our States. All international negotiations must be conducted between nation and nation, not between one nation and an integral but small part of the other.

"Such a course would be perfectly untenable, and no course would be more reasonably apt to goad the injured nation into war than a continual irritation of its national pride similar to that which must result in Japan from discriminatory legislation against the Japanese like that of California and Arizona, especially when followed by the popular applause which has been given to it in various sections, and many newspapers of this country.

"If Congress will pass legislation enabling the Federal Government to enforce compliance by our own people with the terms of all treaties into which the nation has entered, and through criminal proceedings to punish violations of them by any citizen, it will be possible for the National Government immediately to take such steps as may be necessary to control one of the principal present influences tending toward Japanese irritation against us.

"At present the Federal Government is without power to act effectively, although the necessity for such power has been urged often."

"Could there be any Constitutional objection to such legislation?" I inquired.

"None whatever," Mr. Wickersham replied. "The Constitution and laws passed and treaties entered into pursuant to it constitute the supreme law of the land, State laws to the contrary notwithstanding.

"Suppose we had an act of Congress providing that any one doing anything to impair or violate a treaty between the United States and a foreign power is guilty of a misdemeanor, and also giving the Federal Government the power to file a bill in equity to enjoin any violation of treaty rights.

"That would accomplish everything which is necessary to prevent such unfriendly and offensive acts toward a foreign power with whom we have treaty relations. And such legislation in no sense would be in restriction of State rights, it would simply provide ways and means for enforcing the constitutional rights of Congress to safeguard the nation as a whole against untoward acts by single States or groups of individuals.

"It is a curious thing that Congress never has passed legislation adequate to the enforcement of the second section of Article VI. of the Constitution, which says that: 'This Constitution shall be the supreme law of the land, any legislation passed by any of the federated States to the contrary notwithstanding' * * *

"The Constitution also has empowered the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, and, by Section 8 of Article I., has clothed Congress with power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying them into execution.

"To my mind it seems essential that something of the sort should be done as soon as possible. The enactment of such legislation unquestionably would be one of the greatest safeguards against war.

"Any action tending toward the impairment of treaties or the destruction of the lives or property of foreign nationals by States or citizens of this country might be checked through the application of such legislation, which also should provide punishment for those threatening or attempting such impairment or destruction. It would throw negotiations concerning violations of the sort into the hands which should be in control—those of the national Governments involved.

"No one State or group of States should have the right to perform acts likely to give rise to international offense without the sanction of the Federal Government.

"A group of States was refused the right to secede in 1860. It cost four years of time, unnumbered lives and uncounted treasure to establish the principle forbidding it. The matter to which I now call attention should be settled amicably, and promptly, before it spreads beyond the reach of peaceful methods of control.

"For us, as a nation, to make a treaty, without having, as a nation, any means whereby we may enforce observance of it by our own people until such time as it may be repealed or modified, while, at the same time, as a nation, holding the other contracting nation or nations strictly accountable for its observance—is bad international business and bad international morals.

"As a matter of fact, the Japanese have been extremely long suffering and patient, and, also as a matter of fact, our Federal Government has been extremely long suffering and patient.

"In April and May, 1913, when the situation was at its most acute stage in California, when the legislation which could not fail to be offensive to Japan through its open discrimination against her people was under consideration, Secretary of State Bryan went to the Coast for the especial purpose of inducing the California Legislature and Executive to delay or withdraw the proposals.

"His presence in the State somewhat curbed the ardor of the men in the lead of the anti-Japanese movement, but as soon as he had gone the measure was put through the Legislature and promptly signed by the Governor.

"I have said that I was in Japan at the time when the anti-Japanese agitation in California was at its height. The news of the passage and signature of this bill reached Japan while I was there.

"I must admit that the attitude of the Japanese was admirable. Not knowing the Japanese language, I was able only to converse with those who spoke Eng-escaped and the target was placed between the child and the radiator the object was located with great ease. That aid was eliminated. Then some difficulties were apparent in definitely pointing out the target.

"I attended the world congress in Naples in 1909 and was deeply interested in the reading of a paper which was entitled 'Touch at a Distance.' The paper was a report of manifestations of the phenomenon among blind children in Italian institutions, with no attempt at scientific explanation. Since then the subject has been taken up by the French Academy. But this avenue of research has hardly been entered; the subject is worthy of the finest scientific study, and I hope to find time myself to go into it more fully.

"That it is an unusual development of the external sensory nerves would seem to be indicated by a rather common experience among people who see. When you pass, for instance, through an absolutely dark hallway into an equally dark but open space beyond, there is a consciousness of a sense of freedom. And, again, as one approaches a solid wall in the darkness or with the eyes shut, there is a feeling of obstruction. It is very difficult to say what that feeling is.

"There is reason to believe that the ears enter largely into the sixth sense as manifested by the blind, although the ears do not enter wholly into its operation. I have taken a very bright boy, for instance, into a large hall in which the target has been placed. When his ears are plugged with wet cotton, he has seemed quite unable to locate the object. Other blind folk have seemed quite confounded in working out the experiment when their faces have been covered with a veil, although no cotton has been placed in their ears.

"It is very probable that the pressure sense, excited by the slight compression of the air between the solid surface and the surface nerves both of the face and the tympanum, enter largely into the phenomenon."

The intelligent sympathy, the tender regard, and the long patience with which the training and the development of the blind is directed in the institutions for these unfortunate children in this country, particularly in New York State and at the Perkins Asylum in Massachusetts, is, in great measure, a direct development of the humanity of St. Basil of Cappadocia and the raging indignation of the French philanthropist, Valentin Hauy.

It is recorded that in the fourth century, St. Basil opened the first hospital for the blind at Caesareo. There are isolated cases of care for the blind during the fifth century in the refuge opened by the hermit St. Lymner at Syr, in Syria, and of a hospital in the seventh century opened by St. Bertrand, the Bishop of Le Mans. There is no mention of a public hospital again until 1260, when Louis IX. established the Hospice de Quinze Vingts at Paris for 300 of the blind. This hospice still assists the adult blind; the appointments to its care are now vested in the Minister of the Interior for France.

Something, of course, might well have been done; there was no lack of guides to the way. The book on the training of the blind, which caused his imprisonment in 1670; the success Jacques Bernouilli, a Swiss, had in teaching a blind girl to read, in 1676, and Diderot's work on the blind which caused his imprisonment in the Bastile, were not put to their proper work of humanity for many, many years. Rousseau visited Diderot in prison, having read his book, and suggested that the blind might be taught to read embossed printing.

There came a day in 1771 when all the countryside was at festival at the fair at St. Ovid. A showman was doing an enormous business and the laughter of the crowd rang through the groves. Valentin Hauy heard it. He sought its cause. Here were a score of blind men and women, dressed in peacock feathers, decorated with asses' ears, their garb fantastic and ridiculous, their faces painted. Hauy listened to the ribald laughter of the merrymakers, amused by the grotesque antics of the blind. But he read the pain on the sightless faces and was indignant.

"Oh, the inhumanity of this!" he exclaimed. "I shall make these blind to read, and they shall produce harmonious music."

On his way to his quarters the plaintive appeal of a child's voice before a cathedral door of Paris stopped Hauy. The child was a little blind beggar, François le Sueur, and he stood by the stone columns of Saint Germain des Pres that day for the last time. Little François became Hauy's pupil. He learned to read. He learned music. He became something of a help to himself.

It was through him that Hauy invented his system of reading for the blind. The lad one day recognized a letter embossed on a card. The embossed method was then used. In 1785, the first school for the blind was established through Hauy's efforts, and there the system of raised printing was in use. Louis XVI. became interested the next year, and in 1791 the school known as the Institution Nationale des Jeunes Aveugles passed under the protection of the State.

It was there in 1834 that Louis Braille, himself a pupil at the institution and later a teacher, perfected the system of raised dot printing that has been, according to Dr. T. R. Armitage, the greatest contribution to the training of the blind. Dr. Armitage developed the Braille system for the teaching of literature and music. Since then, the New York point system has been invented, and that has displaced the Moon alphabet, which in its day was very helpful.

Probably the work which most startles the visitor to a blind asylum, after he has recovered from the wonder of seeing the blind children work out their geometrical problems with a steel pencil in a slate of soft red clay, dropping perpendiculars and striking tangents with unfailing accuracy, is the work of the blind boys and girls in the gymnasium. Educators have realized that it is of first importance to take the flabbiness out of the muscles of the blind. And it is startling to see blind boys work as fast on the parallel bars as athletes with sight, and to watch the feats of equilibrium which they accomplish with surprising ease and certainty.

The Batavia school is justly proud of a pupil who is now working regularly in a New York State machine shop. Recently the Superinendent of the plant sent to Batavia a picture of the lad at work on the gear-box and rear axle of an automobile. The special plea to the public to allow the blind to tune pianos is meeting a ready response. The musically gifted blind make excellent piano tuners; pianos are tuned by ear, not by sight, and the blind man's hearing is always more trustworthy.

In big factories where there is routine work, such as folding boxes and wrapping small machine parts, blind girls and boys are finding work other than the broom making to which they were apparently condemned a few years ago. Since the addition of the dictaphone to the office equipment, dozens of blind girl stenographers throughout the country have been engaged by business men, who have acknowledged their pleasure at putting their humanity to the test. The blind stenographers, according to reports at the Batavia school, have, with the use of the dictaphone, "made good." Every girl in the Batavia school is taught cooking; they leave for their homes equipped to be quite independent.

"I have always been glad to know," Dr. Lewis said recently, "that the education of the blind has not been a charity in this country. I wish, however, that the country might rouse itself to a realization of the economic loss involved in blindness—blindness of the preventable kind.

"On an average it costs the State but $40 a year to educate the normal child. It costs $350 a year to educate the blind child. There are 6,000 blind in the institutions of this State. There are probably 50,000 in the whole country.

"The very regrettable feature of blindness is that fully 25 per cent., some estimate 40 per cent., of blindness is preventable. It results from the disease called baby's sore eyes, or ophthalmia neonatorium. A drop of nitrate of silver in the baby's eyes will effectually prevent any blindness from this cause."

Dr. Lewis has urged at the national sessions of the American Medical Association that midwives—largely responsible for blindness—should be required to report immediately every case of sore eyes; that the association back a nation-wide campaign to have prepared and distributed free of charge by local health departments the right quantity of these silver salts, which Crede, the French scientist, discovered as the perfect cure.

HARVARD TIES THE CAN TO SLANG

Crimson Wallopers of the Spheroid to Pull Only High-Brow Stuff--How Rough Stuff Might Be Sidetracked.

WHEN Harvard University found that its students were describing, in the undergraduate publications, their adventures in baseball in terms not to be found in that triumph of Harvard scholarship, the Oxford Dictionary of the English Language, that venerable institution of learning did not attempt to remedy the supposed evil in the right way. It essayed to abolish baseball slang. It might better have abolished baseball.

For the game of baseball, resplendent as are its virtues and powerful as are its charms, is after all justified chiefly by the picturesque and romantic literature which it inspires. There are in existence sound citizens who attend baseball games as infrequently as they attend, say, husking bees or bull fights. But there is not one of them who cannot, if he will, take pleasure in the amazing verbal dexterity of the men who for months find daily new and entertaining variants for "Mr. Dusenbury hit the ball into left field."

Recently there came to the shores of this country an English journalist, Cecil Chesterton, who never had seen—and never has seen, up to the time of writing—a game of baseball. Yet Mr. Chesterton found in the sporting pages of American metropolitan newspapers a strange and subtle delight. Avidly he read, without the slightest idea of its significance, such baseball news as was published during his stay in the United States. To repeat to him such a phrase as "The southpaw bunted the spheroid" was to earn his gratitude. For he, like every connoisseur of words, appreciated what is really the poetry of the baseball game—which is totally different from its mere history.

It is easy to imagine a baseball game described literally and prosaically, in the new Harvard manner. It is easy, but unprofitable. The directly interpreted score card—which is the sort of description to be expected—will be of interest only to those who have witnessed the game described, or to those who habitually witness such games. And these surely constitute the smallest and least deserving part of the sporting writer's constituency.

The alleged reform, however, is not directed exclusively, or even directly, at the men who describe the game. It is to affect chiefly the players. The youths who on the diamond defend the honor of Harvard are no longer, we are told, to relieve their nervous tension by such simple and endearing expressions as "'at a boy!" They are to maintain an academic silence, or to utter dignified and stimulating phrases, such as "Courage, my comrade!" and "You have succeeded in disturbing the equanimity of our rival's pitcher!"

It is said that the originator of this linguistic revolution is no be-spectacled professor, but an undergraduate, in fact, the Harvard catcher, John Waterman. That he himself fails to appreciate the joy which the language floating up from the dusty diamond gives the enthusiastic occupants of the bleachers is readily understood. For he has been of the performers, not of the audience, and the audience at a baseball game is an audience in the original sense of the word—it desires to hear as well as to see. It wishes to hear and to absorb into its own vocabular such novel and striking phrases as may be generated in the heat of the fray.

The objections to baseball slang which come from New England's chief factory of sweetness and light are that it is meaningless, that its constant reiteration is tiresome, and that it serves no useful end. The answer to the first objection is that it is true only in part, and that it would not be worthy of serious attention even if it were wholly true. Baseball slang cannot be meaningless. Like all slang, either it expresses an idea more vividly than it is ordinarily expressed, or else it expresses an idea in such a way that it will be understood only by those whom the speaker desires to understand it. In neither case can it be correctly termed meaningless.

The second charge, that its constant reiteration is tiresome, is undoubtedly true, and undoubtedly irrelevant. The constant reiteration of the axioms of geometry is tiresome, the constant reiteration of the greatest lines of Homer is tiresome. Shall these, therefore, be abelished? There are many undergraduates who are wearied by their reiteration even more than they are wearied by the reiteration of baseball slang. As a matter of fact, one of the most obvious reasons for the rise of baseball slang is the desire to avoid monotony—the same thing must be said many times, and naturally the desire arises to say it in a new way.

The third charge, that it serves no useful purpose, is answered, perhaps, in the reply to the first objection. The slang poured out in a steady stream by the players relieves their nervous tension and presumably encourages and directs those to whom it is addressed; at any rate, it certainly increases greatly the spectators. And if there were no spectators there would be no baseball—professional or intercollegiate. And the slang of the sporting page is America's most piquant contribution to the English language.

Harvard's extraordinary pettish ness regarding slang is due to that university's somewhat touching belief in the truth of an ancient epigram. The epigram is, "Slang is language in its shirt-sleeves." Now, this is a perfect epigram, for it is terse, striking, and utterly false. Slang is no more language in its shirt-sleeves than trigonometry is mathematics in its shirtsleeves. Slang is language decked out in its gayest attire, deliberately picturesque, aware that the eyes of the world are upon it. Slang is language not in comfortable negligee, but in elaborate holiday dress.

What Harvard confuses with slang is merely slovenly English—a language clipped and abbreviated by lazy people.

Slang is seldom a matter of abbreviation, and this fact should clear it of the charge of slovenliness. Readers of that most delightful of lexicographical works, Henley and Farmer's "Dictionary of Slang," learn of such elaborate variations of language as "back-slang" and "rhyming-slang." The significance of the term "rhyming-slang" is obvious; "back-slang" consists of reversing the usual pronunciation of a word. For instance, centuries ago, the bravo who swaggered through London's Alsatia called his purse a "srup," his hat a "tah," and a sedan chair a "drof."

Why cannot Harvard find in "back-slang"—which is ancient and English—a welcome substitute for the novel Americanisms it is rejecting? When the young gentlemen who sport the crimson are engaged in that modification of the venerable game of rounders which the vulgar slangily call baseball, they and their companions on the bleachers (no, on the seats reserved for spectators) are henceforth to refrain from such cries of encouragement as "Soak it on the bean!" They are to be permitted to exclaim "Hit the ball!" May they not be allowed the diversion of using "back-slang," which really is almost classical now? It is to be hoped so. In the days to come the welkin will ring (as welkins will) with shouts of "Tih the llab!" and, pleasantest of all, "Llik the veripmu!"

TESTS TO PROVE

That Human Beings Have

A SIXTH SENSE

Blind Children at Batavia Point Out Objects Some Distance Away and Scientists Are Studying the Question of How They Do It.

OPENING the front door of your home you have stepped briskly into the pitch black vestibule, a hand extended to the knob of the inner door. On other nights, you have grasped it firmly and entered as noiselessly as a fish moves in water. This night an indefinable feeling catches you sickly in the diaphragm, and arrests your step. Your derby sounds a hollow clack on the floor as you bring up nose, jaw, and chest to a straight line of star-scattering pain. Untamed expletives explain that some one has left the door ajar. But at that moment you have discovered your undeveloped sixth sense.

It is this sixth sense which for the next few years doubtless will actively engage the scientific study of ophthalmologists, otologists, neurologists, physiologists, and psychologists. Men like Dr. F. Park Lewis of Buffalo will be concerned, however, not with the manifestations of this sense of touch at a distance in those who see, but with the blind children and adults in the State institutions.

The discovery of this sixth sense was announced in a paper read at the world congress of medical men in Naples in 1909. The French Academy has considered its stages of development in blind children and adults, but the phenomenon has not yet been studied scientifically. Dr. Lewis, who brought the announcement to America and who has conducted some researches at the Batavia School for the Blind, intends to work out the theory of sight through skin much more fully during the next few years. He will probably lead the scientific study in this direction.

How wonderful this sixth sense is in the blind boy and girl was demonstrated by Dr. Lewis, who, by the way, is a well-known ophthalmologist, at the one hundred and ninth annual meeting of the Medical Society of the State of New York held recently in Buffalo.

In his paper on the blind child Dr. Lewis said that this unusual condition could only be explained as a consciousness of approaching, or a sense of the nearness of an object having a reasonably large surface. He said:

> Clearly it is a perception of the approach of this material object through some sense other than that of conscious sight, hearing or personal contact. This power in the blind is due to an unusual development of the external sensory nerves.

In other words, the facial nerves of the blind have probably become so delicate in perceptions as to afford these unfortunate children a sight by the skin.

While Dr. Lewis hurried away from the Sixty-fifth Regiment Armory, where the sessions were held, to testify in the Federal court against an eye-disease remedy, the surgeons and physicians adjourned to the sloping lawn before the entrance of the great brown-stone armory. There C. A. Hamilton, Superintendent of the Batavia School for the Blind, was playing a game of tag with a half dozen of his little charges. The armory stands on a hill and the lawns gently slope down to the street. The day was bright and sunny, a brisk Spring breeze tempering the warm sunshine.

Arranging the children in a row, back of which stood the medical men and some 200 men and women who were attracted by the preceding day's announcement of the test, Mr. Hamilton walked noiselessly over the velvet grass and placed a standard about fifty feet away from the nearest child. To the standard he affixed a folding cardboard target, opening it to its widest area of sixteen square feet. So that none of the blind children might locate him, he walked backward from the target after placing it, made a circuit of the crowd and in that gentle voice which tells of those years of patient, gentle effort in training the blind child he announced his approach from an opposite direction.

"Charley," he said, taking a boy of fourteen by the arm of his white blouse, "I have placed a target out on this lawn. I want you to find it, will you?"

The boy, one of the brightest in the Batavia school, smiled, happy at the chance. He walked confidently beside Mr. Hamilton into the bright sunshine of which he had no eye sense. For Charles Ralyea was born blind and has no light perception that his instructors have ever been able to discover. He is now fourteen years old and is proficient in arithmetic, algebra, geometry and music. In the development of the sixth sense he is the best example at the Batavia school.

When the lad was about twenty feet away from the target, Mr. Hamilton stopped him and turned him toward the armory gates with his back toward the target. Mr. Hamilton left him to rejoin the several hundred physicians interested in the test.

"Has he found it?" a little blind girl asked as she heard Mr. Hamilton talking beside her.

"Not yet, Alice. He's feeling for it now. He'll find it all right and then you must try."

The blind boy in the blinding sunlight turned about in all directions. He thrust his head far forward, smiling happily. He was pointing exactly as a setter does for game. The sensitive fingers were working rapidly, thumbs rubbing finger-tips, as he raised his hands to his waist. The neck craned; the cheeks were extended first in this direction and then in another. The boy moved forward against the breeze. He was walking in the direction away from his target. He stopped when about fifteen feet away from the target, sensed again as the pointer might, and turning shot an index finger toward the target.

"There! There!" he called gleefully, "There it is!" and as the men and women and physicians applauded, Charles Ralyea walked to his target, stepping cautiously until he touched it lightly. The blind children standing near Mr. Hamilton clapped their hands softly.

Mr. Hamilton was not entirely satisfied that he had convinced the skeptical among the medical profession. The breeze playing against the target might have been an aid to the happy blind boy. So he placed the target this time, after he had folded it to a smaller size, so that it would not form a wind break for the boy. This time, after a little delay in sensing the presence of the target, Charles Ralyea pointed to it again, at a distance of twelve feet. In this experiment, he had stood between the breeze and his object. Folded to a size one foot wide by two feet high, the target was placed in still another position and at ten feet the blind lad pointed to it.

The other children were tugging at each other's pocket and dress and at Mr. Hamilton's coat tails for a chance, and one by one, with greater delays than in the demonstration of Charles Ralyea, they pointed the location of the cardboard on the standard.

"How did you know where the target was, Charles?" a physician asked.

"I just felt it, Sir. I don't know just how," the boy answered.

"That's the way I do," a girl piped up. "I feel the target. Charley can tell when the target isn't on the stick, can't you, Charles?"

There stood the standard on the lawn about twenty feet from the children. Mr. Hamilton had removed the target. Charles was led out again to locate it. The head is thrust forward; he points sensitively. Evidently this is difficult and the child fears failure, for the sensitive fingers are working nervously again. He points his finger straight out to the north, in the direction of the standard, and has a moment of uncertainty.

"It must be the stick," he says in a hesitant voice. "I don't feel the target."

Dr. Lewis explains that this public demonstration, which seemed to the awe-struck spectators something akin to miracle, may have been particularly successful because of the breeze which ruffled the lawn. These delicate facial and tympanum nerves may have been helped in sensing location by the slight compression of air between the object sought and the child seeking.

Because of the interest which Dr. F. Park Lewis has taken in trying to find an explanation for the phenomenon, an elaborate series of experiments has been conducted at the Batavia School for the Blind. The same sixth sense has been noted, however, in the children of higher mental development in the institutions in New York City and what has been accomplished there by the children in sight by skin was reported by Dr. Arnold Knapp and Dr. James F. McKernon of New York. What wonders may be accomplished for the greater comfort and happiness of the blind through a scientific knowledge of the seat and the development of this sixth sense, Dr. Lewis does not venture to predict.

George Ralyea of Highland born blind, actually locating the target by the sixth sense

Touch at a distance has been remarked during the last few years in several of the quickest-witted children at the Batavia institution. On the walks taken regularly by the blind children with their teachers and supervisors it has not been unusual to get this startling answer from a child, born blind, walking in a total darkness through which no light perception has ever penetrated.

"What have we just passed?" the teacher asks.

"We are passing a building, I think. This is a vacant field, isn't it?" the child answers.

"That phenomenon," Dr. Lewis says, "has been evident with the blind child in many ways at the Batavia school. There are several there who have little difficulty in knowing when they are before a house and in distinguishing their location before a building from a stand in front of a vacant lot. Some have known when the object before them has been a tree, and probably still more remarkable has been the ability to distinguish when the object has been a tree and when it has been a post. That is probably explained by the fact that the post leaves an open space above the height of the head.

"When the experiments in discovering the sixth sense were first started at the Batavia school, we were startled to find that the test of locating the target was universally done with little difficulty. We sought a reason for this because we wished to determine whether the sense depended wholly on hearing. Then we discovered that the highly developed sense of hearing had helped all the children to find the target. A slight hissing was made by the steam in the radiators, and when any of the steam

SIAMESE TWINS TO BE SEPARATED

Two United Little Cuban Girls Arouse Interest of Famous Surgeons—Operation May Sever the Link That Binds Them.

By Van Buren Thorne, M. D.

ACCOUNTS of the successful separation of so-called "Siamese twins" are rare in medical literature. Occasionally one of the pair survives operative interference. Usually, however, the anatomical bond of union involves interdependence of one or more of the physiological functions, and this renders surgical intervention impossible.

While the medical literature of all countries contains records of the birth of united twins, the number of such cases seems to be on the increase. In any event, more such births have been reported in the last ten years than in the twenty previous years.

The rarity of successful separations in these cases attracts wide attention to a proposed operation of this kind. A review of the literature on the subject indicates that the actual conditions found at the time of operation involved complications of a nature unsuspected when surgical interference was decided upon. This, in the writer's opinion, accounts for the high mortality following these operations.

The latest case of fusion of twins to attract public attention is that of two little Cuban girls, Guadalupe and Josephine Honojosa. They were born on Nov. 15, 1912, and are the children of Mr. and Mrs. Diego F. Honojosa. Those who saw them recently at Houston, Texas, describe them as bright and beautiful children, normal in every way except for an abdominal union.

These children were on their way to the Mayo clinic at Rochester, Minn., where, it is reported, they are to undergo operation. The Mayos had not seen the children, but they had been furnished with a physical description of them by surgeons who had examined them. As a result the parents received a letter from the distinguished Minnesota surgeons which contained this statement: "By every law of humanity the children should be separated, and we think that it can be safely done."

This encouraging opinion was responsible for the journey which is now in progress by easy stages.

Guadalupe and Josephine are united at the middle of their abdominal walls by a muscular band of considerable elasticity and about thirteen inches in circumference. When standing in a natural position they are, therefore, face to face. Usually they are very good friends and willingly dance together upon request. The band of union, however, is sufficiently flexible to permit them to walk side by side, their arms around each other's waist, and they can change from one side to the other without inconvenience. It is also possible for one of them to lie on a couch while the other stands on the floor. In this position they form an X. It will be seen, therefore, that the muscular band is very elastic indeed.

The X-ray has demonstrated that there is no bony union of these twins, but it is quite within the bounds of possibility that an attempt to dissect them apart will show fusion of their livers, or that parts of the intestines of each are contained in the abdominal cavity of the other. This has proved to be a complication in at least one recent similar case in which death of one of the twins followed surgical separation.

The problem of personality is readily settled in this particular instance, for, on occasion, they quarrel after the manner of normal children. Sometimes one cries while the other laughs, and, again, one sleeps when the other is wakeful.

The children weighed twelve pounds at birth. They weigh nearly fifty pounds at present. They have an elder brother and a younger sister, both normal children. Their mother is about five feet tall and frail of figure. Their father is a man slightly above the average height, and both parents are normal in every way.

Such unions as these, or, rather, the more intimate anatomical and physiological fusion of twins, is responsible for speculative inquiry not only among eminent men in many branches of science, but among theologians and the exponents of the law. For instance, have these double children dual personalities? Have they one soul or two? Shall they be treated collectively or as individuals in their relation to the law?

Guadalupe and Josephine Honojosa.

Such cases are of profound interest to biologists, psychologists, anatomists, and physiologists. The cause of such variants has been a subject of deep study. The most common explanation is that fused twins are the result of double development from a single germinal cell.

Dr. H. H. Wilder of Smith College read a paper on the origin of these abnormal types at a meeting of the American Society of Zoologists held at Johns Hopkins University in December, 1908. It was entitled "Cosmobia; a Theory Concerning Certain Types of Monsters." After describing several varieties of these, and considering double monsters which are symmetrical in appearance and anatomical structure and those which are not symmetrical, he said:

> It seems that both classes of monsters are due to the same or a similar cause, and that normal individuals also belong in the same general series. To such individuals, both less and more than unity, including also normal forms, the term "cosmobia" or "orderly beings" may be applied.
> These forms are held to be due to some fundamental cause inherent in the germ itself, that is, in the egg or the embryo in the early cleavage stages, and must be carefully distinguished from all deformities that are due to external or later developing causes not germinal.

The most famous prototypes of partially fused children were those who were responsible for the general acceptance of the name "Siamese twins" for these unfortunate cases. Chang and Eng were born in Siam in 1810 or 1811. Later in life they were exhibited to all the world of that day that went to circuses by P. T. Barnum.

Chang and Eng attained worldwide fame and satisfied the curiosity of tens of thousands of persons eager to see the "freaks." They lived to be elderly men, dying at the age of 64, but the tragedy of their deaths indicates the real pathos of such an unfortunate existence. Eng saw his brother die beside him. The horror of the situation and the knowledge of his own inevitable and impending fate drove him into a state of delirium from which he was mercifully delivered by death a few hours later.

The original Siamese twins, in the writer's view, settled once and for all the question of dual personality in fused twins with two distinct heads. It is reported that they grew to dislike each other. Sometimes one of them became intoxicated, whereupon the other became ill. They married sisters, and left twenty-two children.

The repeated occurrence of Siamese twins in recent years is noted in the medical journals of various countries.

Dr. Dudley W. Boswell reported in The British Medical Journal for Nov. 12, 1910, that Siamese twins were born at Lowestof, Suffolk, England, in March of that year. They died during birth. They were united from their breasts downward. It was found that they were perfectly formed above their diaphragms, including their upper extremities. Each had one perfect leg, but the other two were fused. Many of their organs, which were normal, were double. These children were girls.

Dr. W. H. Sharp of Parkersburg, W. Va., reported in The West Virginia Medical Journal for April, 1907, the birth of two boys who were fused as though hugging each other. They were dead. Their chests and abdominal walls were united. Their legs and arms were distinct and perfect.

The birth of twins blended in the thorax was reported by Dr. Peter Horrocks in the "Transactions of the Obstetrical Society of London for 1905."

The American Journal of Clinical Medicine in the issue for May, 1913, records the birth, near Eastman, Ga., of twin boys fused from the middle of the trunk downward. They had but two legs, although heads, arms, and the upper parts of their bodies were normal. Their lives were sacrificed to save the mother.

The editor of the publication remarks that this is a case of "ischio-theracopagus-tetrabrachius." The name indicates the nature of the union. He writes that it is the same kind of union as that of the Tocci brothers, who were born in 1877, and were still alive in 1913.

Several similar cases of thoracopagus are to be found in the literature, among them "Rita-Christina," born in 1829, and "Marie-Rose" Drouin, born in 1878. These pairs of children lived eight and seventeen months, respectively.

In cases such as these the organs in the thorax are usually double or partially double. Two hearts may be inclosed in one pericardial sac. They have duplicate digestive tubes until toward the lower end, including two stomachs.

The editor of The British Medical Journal discussed the problem of personality in connection with these abnormal unions in the issue of June 10, 1911. He took as an example the so-called pygopagus twins known as "Rosa-Josepha" Blazek. Pygopagus twins are those joined at the hips. They are usually back to back, and such was the case with Rosa-Josepha.

The public first heard of these girls in 1891, when they were 13 years old. They were natives of Bohemia. The editor describes them as "intelligent young girls of different tastes." The variation of tastes was manifested in several ways. For instance, one liked beer and the other wine. One was very fond of a certain salad, but the other wouldn't eat it.

Public attention was not attracted to Rosa-Josepha again until they were 31 years old. In the Spring of 1910 they entered a hospital at Prague, where, on April 17 of that year, Rosa gave birth to a normal healthy boy. Dr. Trunecek, who was the attending physician, found that the twins were united posteriorly by the sacrum, (a broad curved bone in the lower part of the back formed by the welding together of five originally separate vertebrae,) which was common to the pair.

While Rosa-Josepha were appearing at a music hall in Berlin a warrant was issued for one of them for her failure to pay a judgment obtained against her in a suit for breach of contract. The warrant was served, and, of course, both were locked up. The innocent one thereupon brought an action for false arrest and imprisonment, the outcome of which was unknown to the editor at the time of writing. His speculative interest in Rosa-Josepha also leads the editor to inquire whether or not a man would become a bigamist by marrying one of them.

A Paris cable of Christmas Day, 1913, told of the arrival there of twin girls a month old, born face to face, and joined by an abdominal muscular strip an inch thick.

On Jan. 5, 1914, the twins, who had been named Madeleine and Suzanne, were exhibited at the Paris Academy of Medicine by Dr. Gustave le Filliatre. They were in excellent condition and were being prepared for the necessary operation. The physicians who examined them at the Academy meeting decided that they were possessed of physical, physiological, and psychic duality.

The operation was performed on March 4, 1914, when the twins were about four months old. The operator was Dr. le Filliatre, and he was assisted by Dr. Risacher, Dr. Victor Delauney, and Dr. Delauney's wife, who is also a physician. Instruments specially constructed for the operation were used, according to the cabled reports.

The cutting was done under local anaesthesia, cocaine being used. When the twins were carefully dissected apart it was found that (as in other similar cases) part of the small intestine of one of the children was within the abdomen of the other.

The dissection was successfully accomplished, and it was believed for a day or two that both would survive. The death of Madeleine from convulsions was announced on March 7, three days after the operation. It was stated later, however, that her death was not due to the operation, but to meningitis. According to the last reports Suzanne was as healthy as any normal child.

CHAMBERS TELLS WHAT GENIUS IS

Says Inclination to Write, Something Worth Writing, and Knowledge of Craft Constitute Author's Equipment.

By Joyce Kilmer.

SENTIMENTAL TOMMY'S great predecessor in the relentless pursuit of the "right word" was, teachers of literature tells us, the unsentimental Gustave Flaubert. But these academic gentlemen, who insist that the writer shall spend hours, even days, if necessary, in perfecting a single sentence, seldom produce any literature. I asked Robert W. Chambers, who has written more "best sellers" than any other living writer, what he thought of Flaubert's method of work.

He looked at me rather quizzically. "I think," he said, with a smile, "that Flaubert was slow. What else is there to think? Of course he was a matchless workman. But if he spent half a day in hunting for one word, he was slow, that's all. He might have gone on writing and then have come back later for that inevitable word."

"But what do you think of Flaubert's method, as a method?" I asked. "Do you think that a writer who works with such laborious care is right?"

"It's not a question of right or wrong," said Mr. Chambers, "it's a question of the individual writer's ability and tendency. If a man can produce novels like those of Flaubert, by writing slowly and laboriously, by all means let him write that way. But it would not be fair to establish that as the only legitimate method of writing.

"Some authors always write slowly. With some of them its like pulling teeth for them to get their ideas out on paper. It's the same way in painting. You may see half a dozen men drawing from the same model. One will make his sketch premier coup; another will devote an hour to his; another will work all day. They may be artists of equal ability. It is the result that counts, not the method or the time."

"And what is it that makes a man an artist, in pigments or in words?" I asked. "Do you believe in the old saying that the poet—the creative artist—is born and not made?"

"No," said Mr. Chambers, "I do not think that that is the truth. I think that with regard to the writer it is true to this extent, that there must exist, in the first place, the inclination to write, to express ideas in written words. Then the writer must have something to express really worthy of expression, and he must learn how to express it. These three things make the writer—the inclination to say something, the possession of something worth saying, and the knowledge of how to say it."

"And where does genius come in?" I asked.

"What is genius?" asked Mr. Chambers, in turn. "I don't know. Perhaps genius is the combination of these three qualities in the highest degree.

"Of course," he added with a laugh, "I know that all this is contrary to the opinion of the public. People like to believe that writers depend entirely upon an inspiration. They like to think that we are a hazy lot, sitting around and posing and waiting for some sort of divine afflatus. They think that writers sit around like a Quaker meeting, waiting for the spirit to move them."

"But have there not been writers," I asked, "who seem to prove that there is some truth in the inspiration theory? There is William de Morgan, for example, beginning to write novels in his old age. He spent most of his life in working in ceramics, not with words."

"On the contrary," said Mr. Chambers, "I think that William de Morgan proves my theory. He really spent all his life in learning to write—he was in training for being a novelist all the while. The novelist's training may be unconscious. He must have—as William de Morgan surely always has had—keen interest in whatever is going on around him in the world. That is the main thing for the writer to have—a vivid interest in life. If we are to devote ourselves to the production of pictures of humanity according to our own temperaments, we must have this vivid interest in life; we must have intense curiosity. The men who have counted in literature have had this intense, never-satiated curiosity about life.

"This is true for the romanticists as well as the realists. The most imaginative and fantastic romances must have their basis in real life.

Robert W. Chambers.

"I know of no better examples of this truth than the gargoyles which one sees in Gothic architecture in Europe. These extraordinary creatures that thrust their heads from the sides of cathedrals, misshapen and grotesque, are nevertheless thoroughly logical. That is, no matter how fantastic they may be, they have backbone and ribs and tails, and these backbones and ribs and tails are logical—that is, they could do what backbones and ribs and tails are supposed to do.

"In real life there are no creatures like the gargoyles, but the important thing is that the gargoyles really could exist. This is a good example of the true method of construction. The base of the construction must rest on real knowledge. The mediaeval sculptors knew the formation of existing animals; therefore they knew how to make gargoyles."

"How does this theory apply to poets?" I asked.

"I don't know," answered Mr. Chambers, "but it seems to me to apply to all creative work. The artist must know life before he can build even a travesty on life."

I called Mr. Chambers's attention to the work of certain ultra-modern poets who deliberately exclude life from their work. He was not inclined to take them seriously.

"There always have been aberrations," he said, "and there always will be. They're bound to exist. And there is bound to be, from time to time, attitudinizing and straining after effect on the part of prose writers as well as poets. And it is all based on one thing—self-consciousness. It is self-consciousness that spoils the work of some modern writers."

I asked Mr. Chambers to be more specific in his allusions. "I cannot mention names," he said, "but there are certain writers who are always conscious of the style in which they are writing. Sometimes they consciously write in the style of some other men. They are thinking all the while of their technique and equipment, and the result is that their work loses its effect. A writer should not be convinced all the while that he is a Realist or a Romanticist; he should not subject himself deliberately to some special school of writing, and certainly he should not be conscious of his own style. The less a writer thinks of his technique the sooner he arrives at self-expression.

"It's just like ordinary conversation. A man is known by the way in which he talks; that is his 'style.' But he is not all the while acutely conscious of his manner of talking—unless he has an impediment in his speech. So the writer should be known by his untrammeled and unembarrassed expression."

I asked Mr. Chambers what he thought of the idea that the popularity of magazines has vitiated the public taste and lowered the standard of fiction.

"I do not think that this is the case," he said. "I do not see that the custom of serial publication has harmed the novel. It is not a modern innovation, you know. The novels of Dickens, Thackeray, and George Eliot had serial publication. But I do believe that the American public reads less fiction than it did a generation ago, and that its taste is not so good as it was."

This was a surprising statement to come from an author whom the public has received with such enthusiasm, so I asked Mr. Chambers to explain.

"In the days of our forefathers," he said, "this was an Anglo-Saxon country. Then the average intelligence of the nation was higher and the taste in literature better. But there came the great rush of immigration to the United States from Europe, and the Anglo-Saxon culture of the country was diluted.

"You see signs of this lowered standard of taste in fiction and on the stage. The demand is for primitive and childish stuff, and the reason for this is that the audience has only a sort of back-stairs intelligence. If we had progressed along the lines in which we were headed before this wave of immigration, we would not be satisfied with the books and magazines that are given us today.

"Of course the magazines are mechanically better today than they were a generation ago. Then we had not the photogravure and the halftone and the other processes that make our magazines beautiful. But we had better taste and also we had more leisure.

"I remember when one of the most widely read of our magazines was a popular science monthly, which printed articles by great scientists on biological and other topics. That was in the days when Darwin was announcing his theory of evolution—the first great jolt which orthodoxy received. People would not take time to read a magazine of that sort now. They are so occupied with business and dancing and all sorts of occupations that they have little leisure for reading."

Mr. Chambers stopped talking suddenly and laughed. "I'm not a good man for you to bring these questions to," he said, "because I never have had any special reverence for books or literature as such. I reverence the books that I like, not all books."

"And have you such a thing as a favorite author?" I asked.

"Yes," said Mr. Chambers. "Dumas."

During the 1890s Mr. Chambers was an art student in Paris, and he has many interesting memories of the French and English writers and painters who have made that period memorable. He knew Paul Verlaine, (whose poetry he greatly admires,) Charles Conder, and Aubrey Beardsley.

"One day," he said, "I was out on a shooting trip—I think it was in Belgium—and I met a young English poet, a charming fellow, whose work I was later to know and like. It was the poet who wrote at least one great poem—'Cynera'—it was Ernest Dowson.

"I knew many of the Beaux Arts crowd, because my brother was a student of architecture at the Beaux Arts. And they were a decent, clean crowd—they were not 'decidents.' I do not take much stock in the pose of 'decadence,' nor in the artistic temperament. I never saw a real artist with the artistic temperament. I always associated that with weakness."

Mr. Chambers, although he has intimate knowledge of the Quartier Latin, has little use for "Bohemia."

"What is Bohemia?" he asked. "If it is a place where a number of artists huddle together for the sake of animal warmth, I have nothing to say against it. But if it is a place where a number of artists come to scorn the world, then it is a dangerous thing. The artist should not separate himself from the world.

"These artistic and literary cults are wrong. I do not believe in professional clubs and cliques. If writers form a combination for business reasons, that is all right, but a writer should not associate exclusively with other writers; he should do his work and then go out and see and talk to people in other professions. We should sweep the cobwebs from the profession of writing and not try to fence it in from the public."

To the somewhat trite question as to the effects of the war on literature, Mr. Chambers made first his usual modest answer, "I don't know." But when I told him of the author who had dogmatically stated that war always stops literature, and that the civil war had produced no writing worthy of preservation, Mr. Chambers reconsidered.

"Did he say that the civil war had produced no literature worthy of preservation?" he said. "He must have forgotten that the civil war caused one man to make contributions to our literature as valuable as anything we possess. He must have forgotten Abraham Lincoln."

Before I left, I mentioned to Mr. Chambers the theory that literature is better as a staff than as a crutch, as an avocation than as a vocation. This, like the "inevitable word" theory, is greatly beloved by the college professors. Mr. Chambers said:

"I disagree utterly with that theory. Do you remember how Dr. Johnson wrote 'Rasselas'? It was in order to raise the money to pay for his mother's funeral. I believe that the best work is done under pressure. Of course the work must be enjoyed; a man in choosing a profession should select that sort of work which he prefers to do in his leisure moments. Let him do for his life-work the task which he would select for his leisure—and let him not take himself too seriously!"

latter"s rascal brother. Incidentally, da Ponte rescues a fair Neapolitan Princess fleeing from an odious husband, but the Council of Ten relieves him of his charge and shuts her up in a convent. Then he reverts to his former sweetheart and her parasitic brother and finally, being caught in an unpleasant affair, is banished from Venice.

He traveled to Goritz with no other baggage than a Horace, a Petrarca, and a Dante annotated by himself. Here he takes his first lessons in German from a kindly landlady, whom he has serious thoughts of marrying, for she was a "generous and virtuous person." At length, however, he decides that marriage is not for him, and he breaks all ties by fleeing to Vienna, where he is received by the Court Composer, Salieri, through whom he is introduced to the entourage of the Emperor.

A charming picture is given of his due of wits with the Abbé Casti, who became his rival in seeking a Court position. In Vienna he met Mozart and suggested to him that operas might be made out of two French plays then in vogue. It is curious to read in da Ponte's Memoirs of the simple manner in which he puts forward the composer's claims to future greatness:

> I had readily understood that after the sudden and universal success of "Il Nocce di Figaro" that the wonderful musical genius of Mozart demanded a dramatic theme that should be at once vast, multiform, and sublime. I suggested "Don Juan," and the idea completely seduced him.

Da Ponte told his New York pupils that before sitting down to write the libretto for this opera he steeped himself in the "Inferno" of Dante in order to obtain the proper horror and grandeur for his background. One may well believe it.

A wonderful sidelight is thrown on the Vienna Court of the period with its jealousies and intrigues, all crowned by the machinations of da Ponte's enemies, when the old Emperor died and Leopold, his successor, turned the poet out. At Trieste, while waiting for a reconciliation with the new Emperor, he married his "beautiful Rosellana of England," who was able later to help him much through "her own honorable industry."

At length he had to abandon all hope of peace with Vienna, and, armed with a letter of introduction to Marie Antoinette, he started for Paris. He got as far as Spires when he learned that Paris "was in the hands of the French and Antoinette was a prisoner in the Temple." So he went to London.

There he became poet to the Italian opera, and sold and printed books until, having indorsed the notes of a friend, he was once more obliged to move on, this time "pursued by twelve bailiffs," to Gravesend, where he embarked on a Nantucket vessel for America. His wife was already here visiting her family, which, in the meantime, had migrated to America.

Of his first years in New York little is known. After having gathered together a few hundred dollars by teaching his beloved Dante, he twice embarked in business and lost his savings. This happened at Elizabeth, N. J., and at Sunbury, Penn. In 1818 he was again back in New York. The manner in which he paid his creditors year after year down to the uttermost farthing shows that he had a good head for mathematics but a poor one for finance.

And now, at last, at 54 Chapel Street, he settled down to a life that was most congenial to him. He sold and imported books and spread the knowledge of Dante through a constantly widening circle. He was sought and beloved by the very best people, whether among the social lights or those of learning, and nowhere does a taint of Molmenti's libel seem to stick to him.

What sort of man did he appear to them to be? In an address delivered before the New York Historical Society in 1857, Dr. Francis said:

> Many of this assembly, and particularly the ladies who now grace this audience, must well remember their old teacher, Signor Lorenzo da Ponte, so long a Professor of Italian literature in Columbia College, the stately nonagenarian whose white locks so richly ornamented his classical front and his graceful and elegant person. He falls within the compass of this imperfect address from his "lonely conspicuity," for the taste he cherished, and the industry he displayed in the cultivation of Italian letters; more than 2,000 scholars having been initiated in the language of Italy by him, and he is still more interwoven with our theme by his enthusiastic efforts to establish the Italian opera among us.

Da Ponte, as has been shown at the threshold of this article, was very jealous of his title of being the first to impart a knowledge of Dante to this country. He was equally anxious to attract the attention of the great ones in Italy to his labor here. In the second edition of his Memoirs he writes, apropos of having sent some notes on Dante to Signor Biagioli:

> Since, however, Signor Biagioli has neither received me "con seno aperto" nor considered me worthy of a reply, I knew to my shame that he neither placed me among the scholars of Italy (and on this point I acknowledged him to be right) nor did he believe my observations worthy of being reported by him. * * * Perhaps he thought it strange that an insignificant language master, who has now been living for more than fifteen years in America, dares to hold opinions different from his own on the interpretation of Dante. But you know well, dear Signor Biagioli, that the good Homer sometimes nods, and that a man without eyes found a horseshoe which others had not found with their eyes.

Da Ponte really was no pedant; if he had been he could certainly not have appealed both to the popular and learned appreciation of New York as he did. His criticisms on Dante show a wonderful grasp of the thought and idiom of the Tuscan of the "trecento," and some of them have since been put forward by Da Ponte's own countrymen as their own. Aside from his pupils his chief mediums for communicating with the public were pamphlets and the newspapers, whose editors always received his messages with respect and usually gave some word of editorial praise—and, of course, there were lectures, both in English and Italian, all usually later to be printed in pamphlet form in both languages. Here is a specimen of his English:

> With her good fortune, Italy for 500 years has preserved her charming language. That language which, from its united sweetness, delicacy, force, and richness, compares with every ancient language and surpasses every modern tongue; which equals in sublimity the Greek, the Latin in magnificence, in grandeur and conciseness the Hebrew, the German in boldness, in majesty the Spanish, and the English in energy. That language, in fine, which Providence bestowed on the Italians because so perfectly adapted in its almost supernational harmoniousness to the delicacy of their organs and perceptions, to the vivacity of their minds, and to the complexion of their ideas and sentiments, and which was formed so justly to illustrate their character. . . .
> The minutes of Columbia College, whose buildings were then situated in Park Row, are curiously pointed in regard to the nature of his professorship there. There are only twelve entries. They begin in 1825 and end four years later:
> May 2, 1825—A letter from Mr. da Ponte was received asking permission to instruct the alumni of the college in the Italian language and to make use of some part of the building for that purpose. The above letter was referred to the Standing Committee.
> June 6, 1825—(At this meeting the report of the Standing Committee was laid on the table for further consideration.)
> Sept. 5, 1825—Resolved, That a professorship of Italian Literature be established in this college, but that the professor be not considered one of the board of the college, nor subject to the provisions of the second chapter of the statutes.
> Resolved, That the attendance of the students upon the said professor be voluntary, and that the hours of attendance be appointed by the professor, under the direction of the President.
> Resolved, That Signore da Ponte be and is hereby appointed to the said professorship, and that he be allowed to receive from the students who shall attend his lectures a reasonable compensation; but that no salary be allowed him from the college.
> Dec. 5, 1825—(Da Ponte offers to sell 263 volumes of Italian works to the college for $364.06. Referred to a committee, C. C. Moore, Chairman.)
> Jan. 2, 1826—Favorable report; the books are bought for the library.)
> Jan. 5, 1829—Ordered that $50 be paid to Signore da Ponte in addition to what he has already been paid for making the catalogue of the college.
> Nov. 3, 1829—(Da Ponte offers more books.)
> Nov. 12, 1829—(Thirty-three volumes bought of da Ponte for $140.)
> Nov. 30, 1829—A proposition was received through the President from Signore Da Ponte offering to add a number of Italian books to the college library upon condition of his having a certain number of pupils provided him to instruct in the Italian language. Whereupon—
> Resolved, That it is inexpedient to accept of the proposition of Signore da Ponte.

Da Ponte was then in his 81st year. Naturally his old pupils began to fall away from him and it was increasingly hard to get new ones. At one time he thought of returning to Italy so that his ashes might commingle with those of Dante, but the gift of $50 from an anonymous benefactor dissuaded him. He speaks of this episode in his "Storia Americana, ossa il Lamento" published in 1835:

> I remain. I will try to be known through the testimony of persons worthy of belief. It is my intention to publish fifty letters from distinguished persons in Europe. They are all precious to me for their contents and the names of those who wrote them; but the name of the benevolent American donor is, to me, the gem of the collection, both from the moment in which it was, and by all it says. One such citizen ennobles any place. New York may boast of many such—with her will I leave my ashes, as I have given to her thirty years of my life. Perhaps those ashes will receive, even from the ill-disposed and the ungrateful, "the vain comfort of late sighs."

The last scene is all that the Danteist could have wished. Samuel Ward, who was later to be known as "America's Unofficial Ambassador to the Courts of Europe," thus described it in The New York Mirror of August, 1838:

> Two days previous to this event (the burial) his sick chamber presented an interesting spectacle. Dr. J. W. Francis, his friend and kind physician since the old operatic days, and to whom the aged poet had in gratitude addressed a parting ode on the day preceding, perceiving symptoms of approaching dissolution, notified his numerous friends of the change in the venerable patient.
> It was one of those afternoons of waning Summer when the mellow sunset foretells approaching Autumn. The old poet's magnificent head lay upon a sea of pillows, and the conscious eye still shed its beams of regard upon all around him. Besides several of his countrymen, were assembled some remnants of the old Italian troupe, who knelt for a farewell blessing around the pallet of their expiring bard; among them might be seen the fine head of Fornasari and Signor Bagioli's benevolent countenance. All wept as the patriarch bade them an affectionate and earnest farewell, and implored a blessing on their common country. The doctor, watching the flickerings of the life-torch, stood at the head of the couch, and a group of fearful women at the foot, completed a scene not unlike the portraiture we have all seen of the last hours of Napoleon.

It had been da Ponte's desire to have the services at his home and then his body quietly laid to rest. His friends would not have it so; and arrangements were made at the Cathedral to have the funeral there. There, all the ceremonial that was possible for an historic and spectacular mother-church to bestow was da Ponte's. Doubtless many who came had never before entered a Roman Catholic edifice.

Among the names of note borne by those who witnessed the last rites in the Cathedral and then joined in the procession to the cemetery were Dr. Francis, Clement C. Moore, Samuel Ward, the Hon. G. C. Verplanck, and Pietro Maroncelli, the fellow-prisoner of Sylvio Pellico of Austrian persecution fame.

It Will Be Fittingly Observed in America, Which Also Celebrates the Centennial of Dante Scholarship Here.

By Walter Littlefield.

If Europe were not now in the throes of war, this month of May, 1915, would be marked by pageants and other exercises in the great universities, in commemoration of the 650th anniversary of the birth of Dante Alighieri. As it is, the great poet's anniversary will be celebrated more extensively in the United States than anywhere else.

The exact date of Dante's birth is not known, so the celebrations will not be simultaneous. But Yale, Vassar, Leland Stanford, De Witt Clinton, and other universities and schools will each at some time during this present month do honor to the immortal author of the "Divina Commedia."

As a matter of fact, this country has a special link to Dante in Lorenzo da Ponte, one time professor at Columbia University.

In 1865 the people of Ceneda in Veretia, wishing to do honor to the 600th anniversary of Dante's birth, as well as to their illustrious citizen, erected a monument to Lorenzo da Ponte, the librettist of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" and "Il Nozze di Figaro" and sometime Latin Poet to Joseph II. of Austria. But the connection between the Florentine and the Venetian does not rest alone on the fact that both were poets, for da Ponte, a century ago, was first to introduce Dante to Americans by imparting to them a knowledge of the Italian language.

After a career as professor, linguist, philosopher, and poet among the highest and lowest in Europe for over half a century da Ponte arrived in New York, in June, 1805, with little else than a box of violin strings in one pocket and a copy of Dante's "Commedia" in another. Here he was to teach successfully, both privately and as the first Professor of Italian at Columbia College, and to try business unsuccessfully, but to find before his end the full expression of that untranslatable Italian word, "simpatia." He was proud of his mission as the first Danteist in this country and was jealous of his title to it, for he once wrote: "In twenty-eight years I have instructed 2,500 persons in my language, which I and none other introduced in America."

New York is today, in point of population, the second Italian city in the world. When da Ponte arrived here there were only three Italian families of image makers, and he tells us that after a careful search he was able to find only one book printed in the Italian language—"a very bad copy of Boccaccio."

Da Ponte died, in his ninetieth year, at 91 Spring Street, on Aug. 17, 1838. On the 20th his funeral was held with great pomp in the Cathedral in Mulberry Street, after which a procession, headed by a banner with a Latin inscription telling of his attainments, bore his body to the old Roman cemetery on Eleventh Street, between First Avenue and Avenue A, where it was left in the vault of a friend, with the intention of later placing it in its own grave with more conspicuous ceremonial. There is no record that this was ever done.

Today a sensitive passerby might stand aghast at the seeming desecration of the place, for the mounds have been leveled and most of the gravestones have been removed. But in the surrounding tenements dwell thousands of da Ponte's countrymen, and on pleasant afternoons the "dialetti" of the language he loved so well are heard, as the young men play the Italian game of "boccie" over his ashes. After all, this may be the monument that he would wish. His composer, Mozart, in far-off Vienna, has not perhaps one so worthy. No one knows his burial place.

Evidently Pompeo Molmenti, the historian of Venice, had never heard of da Ponte's honorable American career of thirty-three years, for in his "Storia di Venezia" he dismisses him briefly and lightly as an adventurer, not of the Casanova type, but as the type drawn by Goldoni in his "Avventuriere onorato" and personified by Guglielmo—a schoolmaster, doctor, secretary in the courts; then a comic playwright and merchant, who flees to Palermo to escape his creditors, where he marries a wealthy widow and abandons the girl of his heart:

> De Ponte is really much nearer this type of adventurer—not bad at heart; but devoid of any fine feeling and ready for any transaction or arrangement. He was born at Ceneda in 1740, and belonged to a Jewish family, called Conegliano, converted to Christianity; he took the name of Lorenzo da Ponte, then Bishop of Ceneda, and after finishing his studies he entered holy orders.
> In 1773 he went to Venice, where he paid more devotion to the beautiful eyes of Angiolina Tiepolo than to his sacred calling. He became reader in Humanity in the Seminary of Treviso, and taught doctrines little pleasing to the Government, which dismissed the troublesome abbé without ceremony.
> He returned to Venice as tutor to the sons of Giogio Pisani, but presently left for Dresden and Vienna, where he was gladly welcomed by Joseph II. and wrote several dramas for music, among them "Don Giovanni" for Mozart. On the death of the Emperor, in 1790, he fell into embarrassments, though they did not prevent him from marrying an English brunette, who persuaded him to abandon his clerical garb.

The foregoing strongly reminds one of the adage of the prophet and his own country; still, we may be grateful for one piece of information hitherto never imparted, not even by da Ponte himself: this is the family name "Conegliano." It has been disputed that da Ponte ever took holy orders or was of Jewish origin.

It cannot be ignored, however, that in a pamphlet issued in Lisbon about 1803, he is attacked as "The celebrated Lorenzo da Ponte, who having been Jew, Christian, priest, and poet in Italy and Germany, found himself to be a layman, husband, and an ass in London"; that Clement Clarke Moore, the pioneer Hebrew lexicographer of the United States, and a trustee of Columbia College, to whom da Ponte probably owed his appointment as professor, often consulted the Venetian; and that in a lecture, "Sull' Italia," delivered in this city in 1821, da Ponte amazed the learned ones in his audience by fluently quoting Exodus in the original Hebrew. Finally, Dr. J. W. Francis, who was da Ponte's New York physician for several years, speaks of his consummate knowledge of Hebrew and Latin in his "Old New York."

Here in New York between the years 1820 and 1823 da Ponte wrote out in Italian for the benefit of his pupils the story of his life. He called the work his "Memorie." It was first printed in 1823 and then in a larger revised edition in 1829-30. Scarcely a copy of either remains. The work has, however, been translated into French and German, but never into English. In his preface to the French edition the celebrated de Lamartine writes:

> The Memoirs of Benvenuto Cellini are not more ingenuous or amusing. . . . These undiscoverable memories were buried in that American forest which we call New York. No one would ever have unearthed them there, where the most precious manuscript will never have the weight of a dollar.

At the end of his volume da Ponte writes:

> At the end of my career of eighty-seven years I have occupied my leisure by composing these Memoirs. I know that the critic will reproach me for a style which is neither brilliant nor firm. I would answer that I am not dealing with a personage but with a very modest man, whose life, passed in a small circle, has created no stir; and so I write of him in simple language, setting down the truth and the events thereof in the measure of their importance.

Da Ponte tells us that he lost his mother at the age of five and that, as he could not endure his stepmother, it became necessary for him to go away:

> At this time Mgr. Lorenzo da Ponte was Bishop of Ceneda. He was a man of great piety, in abundance of toleration, and endowed with the rarest of Christian virtues. Moreover, he had great affection for our family. I went resolutely to him and begged him to place me, together with one of my brothers, in the school which he directed. My request pleased the venerable prelate. He saw on our side a lively desire for knowledge joined to an excellent disposition. He granted with joy this desire, and even went so far as to take upon himself the very considerable expenses of our tuition. The progress which we made was in accordance with the hopes of our benefactor.

Here, in two years, the youth learned to write Latin with ease and elegance. Four years later, his patron having died, the student took his name out of gratitude, and went to the seminary of Porto Gruaro, where a little later he held a professorship of rhetoric. Then came his remarkable experiences in Venice, strongly suggestive of those of that arch-adventurer Casanova, and in which love and gambling colored most of the episodes.

Here, too, we have the principal dramatis personæ of the comedies of the time—the trusting, deceived lover, the mercenary, deceitful sweetheart, and the July 24, 1789.

Following this letter in the scrapbook is a copy of Thomson's reply to the President, on the back of which the cautious Secretary caused Alden, the Deputy Secretary mentioned in the letter from Washington, to sign a full receipt for all the Congressional papers and books.

The next letter received by Thomson from Washington also reflects great credit not only on the opinion of the ex-Secretary held by the President but on Washington's epistolary style. As has been noted, Thomson had won the confidence of the American Indians, and the letter relates to one of the various missions to them with which he was intrusted during his long life. It runs:

Philadelphia, Jan. 31, 1793.

Dear Sir,

The Western Indians having proposed to us a conference at Sandusky in the ensuing spring, I am now about to proceed to nominate three commissioners to meet and treat with them on the subject of peace.—What may be the issue of the conferences is difficult to foresee, but it is extremely essential that, whatever it be, it should carry with it the perfect confidence of our Citizens, that every endeavor will have been used to obtain the peace which their interests would permit.—

For this reason it is necessary that characters be appointed who are known to our citizens for their talents & integrity, and whose situation in life places them clear of every suspicion of a wish to prolong the war, or say rather, whose interests, in common with that of their country, is clearly to produce peace. Characters uniting these desiderata do not abound, some of them too are in offices inconsistent with the appointment now in question—others under impediments of health or other circumstances so as to circumscribe the choice within a small circle.

Desirous in the first instance that you should be in this commission I have mentioned these difficulties to shew you, in the event of your declining, how serious they are, and to induce you to come forward and perform this important service to your country—a service with which its posterity and tranquility are intimately connected.—

It will be necessary to set out from this place about the first of May. The route will be by the North River and Niagara.—It will be safe, and the measures for your comfortable transportation & subsistence taken as effectually as circumstances will admit.—

Will you then permit me, Sir, to nominate you as one of the Commissioners with a certain reliance on your acceptance? Your answer to this will oblige

Dear Sir

Your most obed. and
Very Hble. Servant
Go. WASHINGTON.

Charles Thomson, Esq.

The intimacy of Thomson and Benjamin Franklin appears throughout their correspondence. In Thomson's scrapbooks there are several letters from Franklin and copies of letters to him, extending over many years and quite without the formality which breathes from the Washington epistles. The following letter, sent by Franklin from Passy, while he was on his memorable mission to France, shows that the philosophic statesman and his upright friend were not above enjoying a chuckle even in the midst of the solemnest matters:

Passy, June the fourteenth, 1784.

Dear Sir,

I received yours of April 19th with the Information you obtained from our old Neighbour Reuben Haines respecting Marggrander, for which I thank you. I am much pester'd with Applications to make such Enquiries and often obliged to promise that I will transmit them: but I would not wish you to take more Trouble than to ask Questions of the Members of Congress or others that fall in your way, and communicate to me their Answers if of any Importance. I have also a multitude of Projects sent to me with Requests that I lay them before Congress; they are Plans and Schemes of Government and Legislation, Education, Defence, Manufactures, Commerce &c. form'd by People who have great Good will to us but are totally ignorant of our Affairs and Circumstances, whence their Projects are for the most part wild and impractical, or unfit to be presented to Congress as not pertaining to their Jurisdiction. I have therefore not forwarded them; but will now and then send some of them for your Amusement if you should ever have any desire to see how people make Shoes for Feet they have never measured.

As your Letter mentions nothing of publick Affairs I imagined I might have had, by the same conveyance, some Dispatches from Congress perhaps in the Care of some Passenger; but a fortnight has passed since the Arrival of the Pacquet boat and no letters appeared; so that I have nothing from Congress later than the fourteenth of January and continue in great uncertainty as to my Return.

Mr. Norris came here after residing some time at Liege. He staid but a week or two at Paris and then removed to a Country Town not far distant where nothing but French was spoken in order to improve himself in that subject. He seems a sensible discreet young Man and I shall with pleasure render him any service that may be in my Power.

The King of Sweden is now at the Court enjoying the various Splendid Entertainments provided for him. The Danish Minister is astonished that the Congress are so long without taking any notice of the proposed Treaty. With great Esteem, I am ever,

My Dear Friend
Yours most affectionately,
B. FRANKLIN.

Still more characteristic of Franklin and corroborative of the intimate terms upon which he and Thomson stood is another long letter by him to the Secretary of the Congress. It was written when Franklin was far from pleased at his treatment by his countrymen. With its laborious penmanship, capitalized nouns and quaint turns of expression, it is one of the chief treasures of the Thomson scrapbooks.

Franklin unburdened himself thus:

Philadelphia, December the 29th 1788

Dear old friend,

Inclos'd I send a Letter to the President of Congress for the time being, which, if you find nothing improper in it, or that in regard for me you would wish chang'd or amended, I would request you to present. I rely much on your friendly counsel, as you must be better acquainted with Persons and Circumstances than I am, and I suppose there will be time enough before the new Congress is formed, to make any alterations you may advise, tho' if presented at all it should be to the old one. In the Copy of my letter to Mr. Barclay you may observe that mention is made of some considerable "Articles which I had charged to my Accounts with Congress but on which I should expect from their Equity some considerations." That you may have some Information what those articles Are, I enclose a sketch of my Services to the United States, wherein you will find Mention of the extra Services I perform'd that do not appertain to the Office of Plenipotentiary, viz. as Judge of Admiralty, as Consul before the Arrival of Mr. Barclay, as Banker in examining and accepting the multitude of Bills of Exchange, and as Secretary for several years, none being sent me, tho' other Ministers were allowed such Assistance. I must own I did hope that, as it is customary in Europe to make some liberal provision for Ministers when they return home from foreign service, during which their absence is necessarily injurious to their private Affairs, the Congress would at least have been kind enough to have shewn their Approbation of my Conduct by a Grant of some small Tract of Land in their Western Country, which might have been at least of some Honour to my Posterity and I cannot but still think they will do something of the kind for me, whenever they shall be pleased to take my Services into Consideration, as I see by their Minutes that they have allowed Mr. Lee handsomely for his Service in England before his Appointment to France, in which Service I and Mr. Bollan co-operated with him and have had no such Allowance; and since his Return he has been very properly rewarded with a good Place as well as my friend Mr. Jay: tho' these are trifling compensations in comparison with what was granted by the King to M. Girard on his return from America. But how different is what has happened to me. * * *

This is all for yourself only as a private Friend for I have not nor ever shall make a public Complaint; and even if I could have foreseen such unkind Treatment from Congress as their refusing me their thanks would it in the least have abated my Zeal for the Cause and Ardour in support of It. For I know something of the Nature of such changeable Assemblies and how little Successors are informed of the services that have been rendered to the Cause before their Admission, or feel themselves oblig'd by such services and what Effect in obliterating a Sense of them during the Absence of the Servant in a distant Country the artful and reiterated malevolent insinuations of one or two envious and malicious Persons may have on the Minds of Members, even of the most equitable candid and honorable Dispositions. And therefore I would pass these Reflections into Oblivion.

By the way, can you inform me what became of two Founts of Script Types, of Mine, which were Da'd in printing the Congress Paper Money. I do not find them here, and they cost me Forty Pounds Sterling. I sent two to the Board of War, a Collection of Precedents us'd in the British Offices, which I had been told were lost in the Removal to Baltimore. Do you know whether they have ever been recovered? They cost me 10 Guineas.

When I was sent to France I put all the Cash I could raise into the Loan Office. The paper was then of equal Value with Gold or Silver and indeed part of it had been received from Congress in Discharge of a sum in Gold which I had advanc'd to the Army in Canada. I see by the Minutes of Nov. 1782 that Mr. Lee's Certificates were order'd to be paid in Sterling at the Rate of 4/6 a dollar. I suppoee there must have been some Circumstances attending his Certificates which intitled them to such Favours, and I wish to know what they were. My Certificates, I am told, are now worth but about a Sixth Part of my original Loan.

My good Friend, excuse if you can, the Trouble of this Letter and if the Reproach thrown on Republicks, that they are spt to be ungrateful, should ever unfortunately be verified with respect to your Services, remember that you have a Right to unbosom yourself in communicating your Grief to

Your affectionate, ancient Friend
& most obedient humble Servant
B. FRANKLIN.

Thomas Jefferson also knew Charles Thomson well. The two men were much interested in all sorts of scientific and other dear matters, allusions to which abound in their correspondence. On one occasion Jefferson expounds his theory of the creation of the earth; on another Thomson asks "if any invention has been made for finding the distance of ships at sea," adding what most of us would have added before Marconi: "This would be like seeing out of sight."

The most interesting of all Jefferson's letters preserved in the scrapbooks is one dated "Monticello, Jan. 9, 1815," in which Jefferson writes:

I retain good health, and am rather feeble to walk much, but ride with ease, passing two or three hours a day on horseback, and every three or four months taking a journey of ninety miles to a distant possession, where I pass a good deal of my time. My eyes need the aid of glasses by night and with small print in the day also; my hearing not quite so sensible as it used to be; no tooth shaken yet but shivering and shrinking in body from the cold we now experience, my thermometer having been as low as 12° this morning. My greatest oppression is a correspondence afflicting me laborious, the extent of which I have been long endeavoring me to curtail. This keeps me at the drudgery of the writing table all the fine hours of the day, leaving for the gratification of my appetite for reading only what I can steal from the hours of sleep. Could I reduce this epistolary corvée within the limits of my friends and affairs and give the time redeemed from it to reading and reflection, to history, ethics, mathematics, my life would be as happy as the infirmities of age would admit, and I should look to its consummation with the composure of one "qui summum nec metuit diem nec optat."

So much as to myself; and I have given you this string of egotisms in the hope of drawing a similar one from yourself. I have heard from others that you retain your health, a good degree of activity and all the vivacity & cheerfulness of your mind, but I wish to learn it more minutely from yourself, how has time affected your health, your strength, your faculties & spirits? What are your amusements, literary and social? Tell me everything about yourself, because all will be interesting to me, who retains for you ever the same constant & affectionate friendship & respect. TH. JEFFERSON.

A final proof of the high esteem in which Charles Thomson was held is the fact that David Ramsay, the historian, submitted to him the manuscript of his History of the Revolution for suggestions and corrections. Thomson was not in the least afraid of making them. He took special exception to Ramsay's version of the battle of Bunker Hill—or Bunker's Hill, as it was then called—and expressed his objections to the historian without mincing his words. Below is what Thomson wrote on the subject to Ramsay, that portion dealing with the alleged firing upon the British by the people of Charlestown must be of special interest just now when similar accusations are being hurled at civilians in various parts of Europe.

New York, Nov. 4, 1788.

Dear Sir,

Your description of the works on Bunker's hill are in my opinion too much exaggerated and the firing upon the british from the houses in Charlestown is a circumstance which is denied. The account you have given corresponds with that of the enemy. To save their honour it was necessary to make the works as formidable as possible and to take off from the odium of burning towns at that early stage of the war. It was thought necessary to represent that the Americans fired from the houses. I have conversed with Mr. Gorham on the subject and he informs me that soon after the Americans sat down before Boston Gen. Gage sent for him and informed him as an inhabitant of Charlestown that in case the Americans approached Boston from that side he would be under the necessity of ordering that town to be burned; and that he could not be justified by the laws of war to suffer it to stand to cover the approach of the enemy. This information Mr. Gorham communicated to General Ward who then commanded the American forces: and as it was made known to the inhabitants of the town. As soon as our troops took possession of the hill all the inhabitants of the town instantly fled & left their houses empty. He did not believe there was a single gun fired from any of the houses. From this you see it was a premeditated act, justified by the rules of war and not depending on the firing from the houses.

As to the works on Bunker's hill, how was it possible such as are described could be erected in a space of three or four hours? The truth is our people marched over the causeway & took possession of the hill late at night, instantly broke ground and threw up some slight redoubts of earth. They were discovered at daybreak and a detachment was immediately sent to dislodge them. This detachment landed at a point on the bay at a considerable distance from the town. Upon seeing the number of our troops on the heights they halted and sent back for reinforcements. Upon this our troops immediately pulled up the post & rail fences which enclosed the lots between the town and the bay and set them down again in two parallel rows at a small distance from each other, extending from the earthen redoubt on the right to the town and on the left to the bay. The space between the two lines they filled with hay which had been lately mowed and remained on the lots in cocks. These were the formidable works behind which they sheltered themselves and waited the assault of the enemy.

FAMOUS THOMSON PAPERS SOLD

Correspondence of Secretary of First Continental Congress Includes Letters from Washington, Franklin, and Jefferson.

THREE letters in the handwriting of George Washington and many more written by Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, James Monroe and other famous Americans are among the treasures brought to light here a few days ago when the correspondence of Charles Thomson, Secretary of the First Continental Congress, was rediscovered after having lain hidden for years. The letters, contained in two stout, old-fashioned scrapbooks, were sold by one of Thomson's descendants to a dealer.

Charles Thomson planned to write a history of the American Revolution based on the copious notes kept by him in his official capacity. But in later life he thought that parts of this history would be distasteful to the families of some of the chief actors, so he destroyed his notes and correspondence covering the years of the Revolutionary War. As a result of this, the few remaining papers from his pen possess great historical value.

Thomson was an important figure in the American Revolution. He knew practically all its leaders, some of them—including Thomas Jefferson and Benjamin Franklin—intimately. He was a man of unswerving rectitude, so much so that it became common in his time to say that a statement "was as true as if Charles Thomson's name was to it."

His honesty of character won him the confidence of the American Indians; in one of the letters from George Washington to him the President begs him to undertake a mission to some of the tribesmen. In 1756 Thomson was adopted into the Delaware nation, which bestowed upon him the appellation "man of truth."

He served as Secretary of the First Continental Congress from 1774 to 1789, refusing to take a cent of payment for the first year of his services. After retiring to private life he devoted considerable time to writing. Among his works are "An Enquiry into the Causes of the Alienation of the Delaware and Shawanese Indians," and a translation from the Greek of the Holy Bible, which won him high repute for scholarship. He died in 1824 at the advanced age of 95 years, having outlived most of the celebrities with whom he corresponded. Among these, in addition to those already named, were John Jay; Nathanael Greene; David Ramsay, the historian; George Clinton, Governor of New York; Henry Laurens; George Clymer, signer of the Declaration of Independence; Thomas Mifflin; John Dickinson, and Abraham Baldwin. Letters to and from all of these are contained in the two scrapbooks unearthed the other day.

These scrapbooks have lain in a vault for over thirty years. The letters in them were seen in 1825 by John F. Watson of Germantown, Penn. Watson visited Thomson just before the latter's death in 1824 and in the following year was allowed to look over the Thomson papers by John Thomson, a nephew of Charles. Watson wrote a monograph giving excerpts from the letters for the Historical Society of Pennsylvania in 1853.

In 1878 the text of the Thomson papers, including the letters which passed between him and celebrities of early American history, was reproduced in a publication of the New York Historical Society. This text was taken from copies of the papers made for William B. Reed, a collector. After that the Thomson scrapbooks dropped out of sight until their sale a few days ago.

Though somewhat tarnished and faded, most of the letters are in a good state of preservation. They speak eloquently for the good penmanship of our forefathers. Except for somewhat strange punctuation, and some unfamiliar flourishes and quirks here and there, the letters of George Washington, Ben Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, and their contemporaries are easier to read than most of the hurried, irregular scribbles which we of today perpetrate. And there is in them a courtly leisureliness, a careful turning of phrase, rarely met with nowadays.

Washington's letters in the Thomson scrapbooks are, of course, of the greatest interest. Copies of them are preserved at Washington, but these yellowed old sheets, carefully pasted in his scrapbook by Charles Thomson a century and more ago, are the actual pages on which the pen of the Father of his Country rested, on which he declared himself Thomson's "obedient servant" and set down his signature. The first does not take up any important matter, but is especially interesting in that there is allusion in it to Washington's mother, of whom so little is known.

It is dated "Mount Vernon, twenty-second January, 1784"—the year after the close of the Revolution—and runs:

Dear Sir: The original letter and other papers from the Chevr. de Heirts respecting the order of the Knights of Divine Providence, were transmitted to Congress without a copy being taken; I am a little at a loss therefore in what manner to direct my letter to him, more especially as I had a faint recollection that there is a mode pointed out for the address by the secretary himself—let me pray you, therefore, my good sir, to examine into this matter and after giving my letter another cover to put it into the proper channel for conveyance.

If my commission is not necessary for the files of Congress I, should be glad to have it deposited amongst my own papers.—It may serve my grandchildren some fifty or a hundred years hence for a theme to ruminate upon if they should be contemplatively disposed.

We have been so fast locked in snow and ice since Christmas, that all kinds of intercourse have been suspended; & a duty which I owed my mother, and intended ere this to have performed, has been forced to yield to the intemperance of the weather: but as this again must submit to the approaching sun, I shall soon be enabled, I expect, to discharge that duty on which nature and inclination have a call; and shall be ready afterwards to welcome my friends to the shadow of the vine and fig tree; where I hope it is unnecessary to add, I should be exceedingly happy to see you and any of my late masters, now representatives.

Mrs. Washington, if she knew I was writing to you in the style of invitation would, I am certain, adduce arguments to prove that I ought to include Mrs. Thomson; but before she should have half spun the thread of her discourse, it is more than probable I should have nonplussed her by yielding readily to the force of her reasoning. With sentiments of sincere regd: & esteem,—I am—D. Sir Yr. most obed. servt.

G°. WASHINGTON.

The next letter from Washington to Thomson was written after the faithful Secretary of the Continental Congress had announced his desire to retire to private life. With its old-fashioned courtliness and tone of stately compliment it must surely have filled its recipient with pride. Washington wrote:

To Charles Thomson, Esqr.

Sir,

I have contemplated the note wherein, after mentioning your having served in quality of Secretary of Congress from the first meeting of that body in 1774 to the present time, through an eventful period of almost fifteen years, you announce your wish to return to private life:—and I have to regret that the period of my coming again into public life, should be exactly that in which you are to retire from it.—

The present age does so much justice to the unsullied reputation with which you have always conducted yourself in the execution of the duties of your office and posterity will find your name so honorably connected with the verification of such a multitude of astonishing facts, that my single suffrage would add little to the illustration of your merits.—Yet I cannot withhold any just testimonial in favor of so old, so faithful and so able a public officer which might tend to soothe his mind in the shade of retirement.—Accept, then, this serious declaration, that your services have been important, as your patriotism was distinguished; and enjoy that best of all rewards, the consciousness of having done your duty well.

You will be pleased, Sir, to deliver the books, records & papers of the late congress, the Great Seal of the Federal Union—and the Seal of the Admiralty, to Mr. Roger Alden, the late Deputy Secretary of Congress, who is requested to take charge of them until further directions shall be given.

I beg you to be persuaded that it will always afford me real pleasure to extend whatever encouragements may be consistent with my general duties, to such particular Persons as have long been faithful & useful servants of the Community.

I finally commend you to the protection of Letter from Thomas Jefferson to Charles Thomson.

Her work is constructively strong and is scrupulous in detail. Her frogs and turtles in a lily-pad fountain show not only the closest observation of the creatures in life, but a clear appreciation of their sculptural quality. On the base of a little bronze frog mounted separately the sculptor has incised decorative leaves, and here she misses somewhat the crisp distinction of her style, scribbling in place of writing. Her work promises so much in the direction of personal force that one is tempted to overemphasize the importance of minor defects which interrupt the generally excellent impression. It is an impression into which everything should be made to play.

Miss Eberle shows a figure of a laborer on a larger scale than most of her work and very serious in conception. Obviously she has been enlisted by the informal aspect of a man in clothes molded by his occupation to his large-boned figure. The face is fully characterized. The suggestions of the grotesque in the deviations from conventional precision are given just their right value. All that lacks is, unfortunately, the essential mastery of anatomical truths that cannot be contradicted by external accidents of appearance. In every figure, courtier or peasant, the ball and socket joints explain the possibility of free movement in various directions. In Miss Eberle's laborer the sense that these joints exist and play their responsible part in his activities is altogether absent. He is not that marvelous and intricate architecture of bone and muscle which is man, but an abridged mannikin of unrelated parts. Miss Eberle's talent is great, and she has many charming creations to her credit. She has made certain types her own. Her old women of the east side, her sweeper, the children swinging about to hurdy-gurdy music, these linger in the mind as true expressions of life. Her researches into this new type have led her somewhat astray, but she has the determination without which an artist is nothing, and it presently will be seen that she has conquered her difficulties and forced her idea of a man stamped with the impress of toil into sculptural form.

Among these objects of bronze and clay three versions of a young child in the early stages of learning to walk strike a sharp note by the brilliancy of the white marble in which they are cut. The modeling is excellent, certain without meticulous finish, and each of the three poses is animated and spontaneous. Our keen white light is, however, unfavorable to marble, and the material here, as in Northern and Central France, seems baldly to stare from any environment in which it is placed.

A much more ingratiating effect is gained by the use of such stone as that in which Mrs. Whitney has cut the head and shoulders of a stalwart and aspiring youth. In cold marble it might suggest the fixed mood which, even at its highest, is petrifaction in art. Bronze would dress it too elaborately in light and shade. This gray, quiet stone, with its slightly roughened surface, expresses intensity without surplusage. What easily could have dropped to rhetoric becomes eloquence.

The relief by Sara Morris Greene, two heads in a frame of vines and grapes, is the most impressive thing in the room. The artist has varied the scale of her finish to create a broad range of values. The bold, deep modeling of the heads, powerfully defining their structure, is contrasted with the shallow modeling of the chest and arm, which, nevertheless, keeps the suggestion of force and muscular reactions. The greatest individuality is given to the features and their rough blocking out in this preliminary study breaks the light and shade into large general masses, which are lightly troubled by the minor variations of the surfaces and textures. A vigorous free work, based on remarkable mastery of modeling.

Another very fine example of a large treatment of form with interesting variety in light and shade is found in Olga Popoff Muller's "Breton Group," a mother, father, and child, in a massive composition with few holes and extreme simplicity of contour. The wide, heavy skirts of the woman and the thick material forming rugged inflexible folds accentuate the essentially monumental character of the group, but over these rude garments and over the vaguely defined heads the light plays with exquisite subtlety a complicated game of hide and seek and adds the element of surface beauty to the material.

These two works in themselves are sufficient to lift the exhibition far above mediocrity, and there are many others showing sufficient grasp of sculptural problems to establish a fairly high level. Of animal sculpture there is little, but a zebu by Grace Johnson has subject novelty. There are bird baths and sundials; Janet Scudder's "Girl with Fish," Harriet W. Frishmuth's graceful double fountain in the theme of a girl riding a dolphin, Edith Woodman Burroughs's "The Water Baby" fountain; there are vases of unusual design, such as "The Flower Bearer," by Mrs. Guinness; there are clever candlesticks by Annetta Saint-Gaudens; there is a design for a clock by Isabel Kimball; there are terminal figures for a garden by Mabel Conkling, and other indications that sculpture is actually entering into the daily life of house and garden. There are also, of course, portraits, Anna Coleman Ladd's portrait of Mrs. Robeson Sargent perhaps the most striking, in part because of the boldness of the characterization, and in part because of the rather unhappy color in which the artist has chosen to show it. The tendency toward experiment in color is, however, another favorable sign of the times, showing that the sculptors are breaking useless bonds and feeling the full and many-sided significance of their work. Taking it all in all it is an exhibition of genuine interest and promise. And if one must say anything about the irrelevant fact that the exhibitors are all women it may be got over by noting that the best things in the exhibition prove women capable of sustained attention and steadily directed effort.

Art and the War in France.

M. Henry Lemonnier in the Figaro reminds his readers that the thirty-fourth Salon of painting and sculpture opened Aug. 10, 1793, amid war and invasion, with the Terror at full flood. Probably, it continues, there will be no Salon in 1915, the greater number of artists having gone to their duty in the army. Those who are kept out of the war by reason of their age or other incapacity should, however, follow the example of the poets and prose writers in recording the great events in which their country is nobly bearing her part; should balance savage destruction by creating works of beauty and serenity. Benezech's appeal to the artists of France in 1796 is recalled, and it is urged upon those of the present day, as poignant as any known to the past, to study contemporary life and types, to watch the women in the streets assuming the burdens of the men; the eating places, the ambulances, the wounded, the bereft, and to draw their inspiration from this tense and significant life of today. It is not uncommon to see among the women of the middle classes sad, dignified faces like those of Philippe de Champaigne's portraits; among the working classes individuals recalling the melancholy gravity of Le Nain, and in the workrooms young girls bent over their sewing as in the pictures by Chardin. The only thing absolutely necessary, M. Lemonnier insists, is that the art thus produced shall be free from superficiality, shall have nothing of stupid anecdote or vulgar sensation; that it shall express something that has filled the mind, heart, and vision of the artist, and then, he says, who knows if a national art may not be born as in earlier times of national peril and triumph, of events that submerge the soul only to revive and exalt it? M. Lemonnier, no doubt, is right in exhorting his countrymen to heroic efforts, but the passion that gets itself expressed in art is a remembered passion recalled with calculation and interpreted with a cool brain and even pulse.

EXHIBITION OF ALLIED ARTISTS

Art at Home and Abroad

The New Show in the Fine Arts Building Practically an Extension of the National Academy Exhibition in Appearance.

THE Allied Artists of America have opened their second annual exhibition at the Fine Arts Building and the visitor accustomed to the appearance of the seasoned galleries will reflect that the new exhibition might very well pass as an extension of the Academy, with a little more room, greater discretion in hanging, and perhaps more homogeneity in the collection.

Nothing in the way of a sensation should have been expected. The aim of the young society is merely to give a group of artists additional opportunity to present their work. As already has been stated, there are no prizes, and there is nothing in the way of each having his chance. When the space came to be apportioned each exhibitor drew from a box a little gelatine capsule filled neither with sedative nor tonic, but with a small paper bearing a number. In several instances works were withdrawn because the artists thought a certain space would look better with fewer pictures. F. Luis Mora drew a panel number designating a place other than that occupied by his Spanish girl in the Vanderbilt Gallery, but he was given the central position by a consensus of opinion. All of which means that the members of the society are working together in harmony, and also that they are something of a relief to the Academy itself, which is not so put to it to get everything hung when another chance is in view for those who may be crowded out. Whether this is all there will be to the story after two or three more years have passed is problematical, but the exhibition as it hangs reflects a peaceful and modest spirit and contains some excellent work.

It especially expresses the peculiar American note of sensitiveness that makes itself felt through the hubbub of foreign galleries and that corresponds as little as possible to the popular idea of Americanism. It is Americanism, however. Frenchman, German and Englishman each wears in public a certain shell of indifference which as yet has not formed about our national temperament, however indifferent we may strive to appear. This sensitiveness gets into our art sometimes to its detriment, but on the whole to its salvation.

Mr. Mora's "Zana," for example. It is the kind of thing that makes the average artist think first of how dazzling pigment can be got to look. The black shawl with its bright flowers, the creamy flowered shawl of the background, the gay fan, the glowing face framed in black hair—how easy it is to reconstruct it in terms of either Spanish or French art. Perhaps only an American would treat such a subject with such a defference. The long, slim feeling hand that droops with a languor that has no sleep in its passivity, the head delicately enveloped by a mild atmosphere, the fan taking its place quietly in the scheme, the expression bearing out the mood of the painting, faintly quizzical, friendly, tender, ever so little withdrawn. It is a lovely picture, but not one to scream out its charm across a gallery.

A wholly different impression is given by Christina Morton's bold studies of red-haired girls in strong light. The drawing here is direct, the color rather violent. It is fresh work by a painter deeply interested in her technical problems and as such is good to look at, but it tells you comparatively little about anything except the technical problem. Mr. Mielziner's portrait of Professor Julius Sachs of Columbia, on the other hand, tells you a great deal about both the artist and his sitter, and the rich vigor of the browns is notable. Brown is a color so difficult to put into a picture without losing the sense of color that a triumph in this direction always calls for applause.

Portrait of P. Zimmerer, by Henry Salem Hubbell. (At Allied Artists Exhibition.)

G. L. Nelson has a portrait of a woman and child in which he seems less at home than usual with his medium. In another canvas, a mediaeval-looking boy turning about from a table on which a dish of oranges makes a decorative yellow patch, he is master of himself again and has achieved an effective decoration.

Other portraits that are interesting are Orlando Rouland's, especially his alert lady in gray, with pleasantly interrogating eyes, Henry Salem Hubbell's casual and entertaining portrait of Mr. Zimmerer, which was seen at the National Arts Club, and Benjamin Kopman's sad-eyed woman holding a blue flower. In this last research into character is pushed so far that portraiture is inevitably inferred, but the landscape, the red orb in the sky, the second figure fleeing toward the horizon, the bits of bright herbage in the foreground, all wear a teasing look of significance and symbol, dissociated from life.

The centre gallery contains thumbox sketches, drawings, and etchings, and lends to the exhibition the agreeable lightness of mood brought by these side issues in the mighty business of art. It is apparent again, as it has been many times before, that these side issues occasionally eclipse the more emphatic business in aesthetic importance. Ledyard Towle's group of studies, for example, his jewels of color picked up in the neighborhood of Washington Square and the streets of the lower city, his entertaining whimsical drawing called "The Merchants of Bagdad," are much more nearly a complete and satisfactory expression of his artistic idea than his large red-haired lady in black and white gazing into a mirror at a somewhat overgrown reflection of her face while a cockatoo plucks at her powder puff. There is merit in the big picture and some very adroit passages of color, but it is not a whole thing, a work marching straight to its destination from the moment of its forming in the mind of the artist.

G. L. Nelson's chalk drawings also are more expressive than his larger paintings, and Arthur Crisp's show the kind of work done by an artist for his own deep edification and instruction. "The Embrace" is a true sketch, without effort or pretense. The study by F. Edwin Church of a little nude crouching on a sofa, the color pretty well scraped out, leaving the ghosts of color that so often come enticingly into a sketch, far surpasses in interest the larger finished version of the same subject, in which the colors reach a slightly shrill pitch, and the modeling of the little figure is too soft. Kopman's etchings, again, suggest the romantic mood without rousing the sense of incongruity that rules his lady in a landscape, his "Scissors Grinder" giving to a prosaic and ordinary subject an indefinable hint of mystery and vision.

The landscapes are numerous, and include many ways of looking at nature. Lester Boronda sees the color of lighted boats reflected in blue water, with a close notation of values; and George Elmer Brown strikes a full note in his picture of boats at a wharf. George Burr, Paul King, De Witt Parshall, Harry Hoffman, Alexander Gringer, Clarke Voorhees, Jules Turcas, Edward Potthast, Ernest Peixotto, G. Glenn Newell, Edmund Greacen, Ernest Albert, Chauncey Ryder, represent as many styles of painting and habits of seeing.

In genre also the pendulum of style swings from Maynard's girl in a hammock to Fehrer's girl at a tea table done in large, square touches. It only remains to repeat that nothing startling, nothing sensational, nothing very new is revealed by this exhibition of the Allied Artists, but much that is pleasant to see is there to be seen. Probably if we are to have an art that moves us deeply we must begin by feeling rather deeply in daily life. And these deeper feelings, when they come, must be expressed in an idiom made up of a dozen languages each become our own. It is a problem that hardly can be satisfactorily solved in advance of history, what this art of ours will grow into, but many of us are haunted by the conviction that the war will prove an element of inspiration after we have got beyond the mere news of it.

The Annual Exhibition of Sculpture by Women, Now Open at the Gorham Galleries. Much Creditable Work and Some of High Quality.

Sculpture by Women.

At the Gorham Gallery the annual exhibition of sculpture by women is under way, and the work in the main is interesting, although few achievements detach themselves from their background with special salience.

The time of the year and a wholesome tendency to meet a practical demand account for the preponderance of fountain figures and compositions.

Anna Vaughan Hyatt, who has been too much occupied with her Jeanne d'Arc to do anything else of decided importance, sends a delightful sketch for a fountain, in which the spray, starting from the rim of the bowl, curves in toward the central figure. This figure—long, slender, and gracefully poised—holds in its hands a pliant stem of flowering vine, and birds are fluttering about it. The idea is daintily suggested, but calls for thought in the working out.

Miss Shonnard's "Marabou" designed to be executed in stone for gate posts, combines monumental character with an acute reading of the idiosyncrasies of the bird.

"Zana," by F. Luis Mora. (On View at the Allied Artists Exhibition.)

A SOURCE OF INNOCENT MERRIMENT

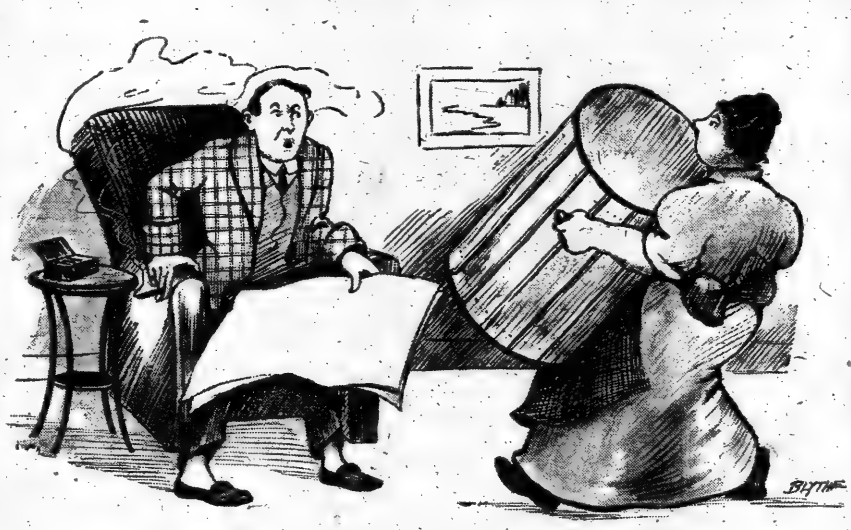
The man who feels that he is a law unto himself always respects the law.

Gossip will generally get there without the aid of a special delivery stamp.

The great trouble about taking a chance is that you can't always put it back where you found it.

A fellow sometimes doesn't know whether he is really engaged, or whether he merely has an option on the girl.

Ambition is the yeast that causes a man to rise to the occasion.



"Here is the ash receiver you called for, Sir."

About the only things some people never put off till tomorrow are the disagreeable things they can do today.

Many a man sings his own praise whose musical education has been sadly neglected.

Few things are so futile as a bachelor and a married man giving each other advice.

The only time many a fellow uses his head is when he wants to butt in.

Every fellow tells a girl he isn't worthy of her, but he doesn't expect her to believe him.

Behind Time

THERE is a Chicago man, dwelling in one of the suburbs, who goes into the city every day to look after a mail order business.

One afternoon last Winter he took the train for his home, but a terrific snowstorm was raging, and about half-way to his suburb the train was snowed in. All night the passengers were imprisoned. Early in the morning they managed to reach a nearby telegraph station, from which the Chicago man sent the following message to his office: "Will not be in the office today. Have not got home yesterday yet."

Even.

THE conscientious girl worried so much over having paid for two eggs with bad money that soon the unconscientious girl also developed a conscience.

"It really is too bad that you cheated the poor man," she said, the next time they met. "I think I feel almost as bad about it as you do."

"Oh, don't worry," said the conscientious girl. "I am glad of it now. Both the eggs were bad."

A Square Deal.

WHEN the jury in a Western court found the accused guilty of the crime charged, the prisoner rose in the dock and dramatically exclaimed:

"May Heaven strike me dead if I am guilty!"

The Judge waited a few minutes, and then said:

"Prisoner at the bar, since Providence has not seen fit to interfere, the sentence of the court will now be pronounced."

What More Could Be Asked?

"Robert," said his father, "I thought I told you yesterday to clear up the yard."

"Well, I did," declared Bobby, virtuously. "I fired everything over the fence soon as I got home from school; but the kid next door throwed 'em all back after dark."

The Puzzling Point.

Enthusiastic Aviator (after long explanation of principle and workings of his biplane)—Now you understand it, don't you?

Young Lady—All but one thing.

Aviator—And that is—?

Young Lady—What makes it stay up?

Safest Plan.

"I want to knit socks for the European soldiers."

"Well?"

"What color would you select?"

"Better make 'em some neutral tint."

In the Trenches.

"No blankets, Captain."

"Well, boys, we'll just have to cover ourselves with glory."

The Two Kinds.

An optimist is a person who smiles at knocks; a pessimist is a person who knocks at smiles.

A Spring Pome.

'Twas in the gloomy Autumn when I walked about the Zoo.
The creatures had the blues, except the leaping kangaroo.
"How can you be so cheerful at this dismal time?" I cried.
"It's always Spring with me, my friend," the kangaroo replied.

FOOTWORK

It really almost makes me smile,
So wonderful the treat,

And only move two feet.—N. Y. Times.

Yet does he only move two feet?
The problem grows more hard
Because, in fact he moves three feet
In running every yard.

Come, now! The problem's not so hard,
In error do not fall.
Eleven feet in every yard
He'll move—he's six feet tall!

The Gentle Cynic.

Life is a hurdle race over the ifs and buts.

Anticipation is one of the greatest pleasures in life. If we could afford to buy a lot of the things we want, we wouldn't want them.

How It Paid Him.

Hewitt—Do you think that writing poetry pays?

Jewett—In a way; had it not been for my work in that line, I should never have known the real benefits of fasting.

The Problem Play.

A curious thing concerning plays
I can't quite figure out, for though
The one that has a long run stays,
Yet that's the one that is a go.

"Mummy, dear, when shall I be old enough to have short skirts like yours?"

Arbitration

A PEACEABLE man in a steel town of Pennsylvania came upon two youths fighting. "Let me beg of you," he earnestly besought, "to settle your dispute by arbitration. Each of you choose half a dozen friends to arbitrate."

Having seen the twelve arbitrators selected to the satisfaction of both sides, the man of peace went on his way rejoicing. Half an hour later he returned that way, and was horrified to find the whole street fighting, while in the distance police whistles could be heard blowing and police rushing to the spot from all quarters.

"Merciful Heavens! What's the matter now?" the peacemaker asked of an onlooker.

"Shure," said the man, "the arbitrators are at work!"

DANTE AND AMERICA

Professor Johnson's Translation of the "Commedia" a Notable Tribute from This Country to the Italian Poet on His 650th Anniversary

By WALTER LITTLEFIELD

LA COMMEDIA DI DANTE ALIGHIERI. The Divine Comedy. Translated by Henry Johnsen. Pp. 444. Royal Octavo. New Haven: Yale University Press. $2.50.

SIX centuries and a half from the date of birth seems to be a fair period in which to judge of the greatness of a poet, even though the judgment be based upon particular as well as general definitions of the word "greatness" and "poet." But whatever be our favorite definitions, whatever our predilections in regard to language and literature, there are certain facts in regard to Dante and his "Commedia" which cannot be ignored in pronouncing a personal opinion.

No work, except the Bible, has such an enormous bibliography as Dante's poem, and no work, with the exception of the Bible, has been translated wholly or in part into so many languages, although there is one language which possesses only a single canto of the "Commedia" and a complete translation of Homer. That is the Icelandic. In English there are twenty-four complete translations of the "Commedia"; in German nineteen; in French sixteen; in Spanish six; in modern Greek, Russian, Danish, Dutch, Hungarian, and Portuguese two; in Bohemian, Polish, Rumanian, and Swedish one. In the Latin language there are four versions. In twenty-eight languages and fourteen dialects of Italy the Tuscan of Dante appears in citations of varying length.

The canto in Icelandic is the Fifth of the "Inferno," which includes the famous story of Francesca and Paolo. That episode has been productive of more translations, inspired more stories and plays, than any episode to be found in the works of any other poet.

What may be said to be the popular appreciation of Dante in England began with H. F. Cary's translation of the "Commedia" completed in May, 1812, but prior to that date, from Chaucer down, the story of Dante's influence on English literature, resulting in translations, commentaries, imitations, and plagiarisms, has been faithfully chronicled by Paget Toynbee in two large quarto volumes of nearly 1,500 pages ("Dante in English Literature, from Chaucer to Cary," 1909.)

In 1660 a discussion took place among Thomas Fuller, Robert Herrick, Jeremy Taylor, Abraham Cowley, John Milton, Izaak Walton, Robert Boyle, John Dryden, and others as to who was the greatest world-poet. The records of the discussion have been lost, but it is known that Homer came in for first place and that after him trailed Virgil, Horace, Chaucer, Shakespeare, and Dryden himself. The name of Dante did not appear.

Today critics would still unhesitatingly give Homer first place, while national and popular appreciation might imitate them and then consign the second place to Shakespeare, Dante, or Goethe; or, not imitating them, claim first place for their national favorite among the last three. In any case, however, the world's stupendous biblioteca danteseca would have to be taken into account.

The foregoing properly arouses curiosity as to what American scholarship has contributed to the study of Dante and what has been the popular appreciation thereof. Here, as elsewhere, except possibly in Italy, scholarship and popular appreciation developed along separate paths, occasionally in conjunction, but more frequently widely divergent. Of the twenty-four complete English versions of the "Commedia" four are the work of American translators, but the work of American commentators being put forth principally in the lecture room or through special publications is not so obvious. It has, however, very often received high academic recognition in Italy. As to the popular appreciation of Dante, although that has placed itself on record by a profusion of fragmentary translations, original poems, and essays, its inspiration has not, I believe, so often come from Dante himself as from the English Cary and the wonderful pictures which usually accompany him from the hand of the French artist, Gustave Doré, which may be obtained, to suit any taste and purse, at the book counter of any department store. The verses and pictures by D. G. Rossetti and other Pre-Raphaelites have also been a strong formative influence, although not so much so here as in England.

In the circumstances, it would be most difficult to define the formative influences of popular American appreciation of Dante or justly appraise their worth. With American scholarship it is another matter. Before, however, I attempt to chronicle some of the deeds of American Danteists, it cannot fail to be of interest to dwell for a little while on something which, in this the 650th anniversary of Dante's birth month, may serve to bring the scholar and the admirer into closer, more sympathetic communion than they have hitherto enjoyed. This something is a new translation of the "Commedia" by Henry Johnson.

The occasion met and the great effort made by the translator would in any case render his work conspicuous. To me, however, it seems to be more than this. To me it is the most satisfactory rendering, all things considered—fidelity to word and spirit and nature of metrical vehicle—that has hitherto appeared in the English language. The translator's remarkable familiarity with both the Tuscan and the English idiom has enabled him to make an almost line for line construing and almost, also, to place, in the context, his words where Dante placed his, while the smoothness of verse and simplicity of thought are rendered beyond all praise by his evidently careful selection of Anglo-Saxon words rather than those of Latin or Norman origin. And finally the question may be asked: Is it scholarly restraint or a sublime disdain of all commentators which has caused him to remain obscure where Dante is obscure? Nowhere does he by ingenuity or subtle use of word or emphasis attempt to reach the unattainable. He leaves as it is Pluto's warning signal to the boatman, Phlegyas: "Pape Satan, Pape Satan, Aleppe!"

In the Italian language stress, cadence, and sound so harmonize or supplement each other in verse that very often the spoken phrase bears the correct meaning to a hearer entirely unacquainted with the language. For this reason the dictum of Longfellow pronounced long ago has hitherto been held to be correct:

> In translating Dante something must be relinquished. Shall it be the beautiful rhyme that blossoms all along the line like a honeysuckle on the hedge? It must be, in order to retain something more precious than rhyme, namely, truth,—the life of the hedge itself.

If it be the ideal of the translator to produce upon his reader's mind the same effect as the original composer produces upon his reader he can no more ignore a careful selection of his vehicle of expression than can an original poet in choosing a meter that shall aid his theme. Certain meters are almost equally effective in all languages. The English blank verse, the French alexandrine, the Italian terza rima are not. Dante wrote his poem in the last. Professor Johnson chose the first for his translation. From Byron down there have been many attempts to make Dante's terza rima sing in English. The last was a tour de force performed by John Pyne, who not only transplanted the terza rima but grafted upon it Dante's original rhymes—a unique, curious, and not altogether unpleasing performance. Other translators who have affected the meter of the original have been C. B. Cayley, J. J. Chapman, E. R. Elliaby, F. K. H. Haselfort, W. Pike, and E. H. Plumptre, all in complete renderings of the "Commedia." T. W. Parsons, as did Longfellow, tried it and then abandoned it, the former for the quatrain of Gray and Dryden, and the latter for the blank verse of Marlowe. A. J. Butler, J. A. Carlyle, H. F. Tozer, and Charles Eliot Norton translated the "Commedia" into prose, the last with a Biblical simplicity that is pleasing to ear and understanding.

But with the medium of expression chosen in defiance of, or in sympathy with, Longfellow's judgment, or possibly with the hope of rendering that judgment nought, translators have not been insensible to other influences as contributory elements of their inspiration. Parsons, who is recalled as "The Poet" of Longfellow's "Tales of a Wayside Inn," did much of his work in Tuscany itself; Longfellow did his at the breakfast table; Norton in his study with James Russell Lowell leaning over his shoulder.

Professor Johnson has chosen blank verse for his translation of the "Commedia." He was born nearly sixty years ago in Gardiner, Me., was educated at Bowdoin College, at three German universities, and through several years of European travel and study. He belongs to certain societies whose object is the cultivation of the fine arts. He has written original verse and has edited and translated that of others. He has been Professor of Modern Languages at Bowdoin, and enjoys close affiliations with Yale. And now I believe he has succeeded better in transplanting the blossoms of the Dantesque honeysuckle hedge than have any of his predecessors.

As most persons are familiar with the opening of the

LATEST WORKS OF FICTION

Samuel Merwin's "The Honey Bee"—Books by St. John G. Ervine, James Oppenheim, Warwick Deeping, Erskine Childers, and Others

THE HONEY BEE. By Samuel Merwin. Illustrated by H. M. Crosby. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $1.35.

THIS is Mr. Merwin's fourth book since he took up for the second time the writing of fiction, with a new attitude toward that art. As a very young author he wrote several novels that were chiefly concerned with plot and incident. Then, after a number of years devoted to newspaper and magazine work, he turned his attention again to fiction. The volumes that have since come from his pen have shown a steady advance in artistry, in sureness of method, in the ability to sense and reflect those tiny facets of character in which dwells so much of the life-giving quality. In his later books he has given evidence of an increasing feeling for character, and this appears in "The Honey Bee" with such richness and variety, such strength, sureness, and clarity of conception, and such delicacy in handling as to make the novel much bigger and more vital than any of its predecessors.

The book does not pretend to be anything more than a story, and one feels all through that the author was interested in it solely as a story, a tale in which the people themselves and not a preconceived plot should be the source of all the action and all the developments. Nevertheless, as a study of the character of a successful business woman and of her attitude toward life, it is a reflection of one phase of the present day that has sociological value. Hilda Wilson, the heroine, is perhaps the truest, most convincing, and most alive modern business woman that has found her way into fiction. At the beginning of the story she has fought her way up to an important position in a huge New York department store. For some years she has been at the head of the department of women's apparel, and is now upon one of her semi-annual inspection and buying visits to Paris. The scenes of half or more of the book are laid in that city, and the action is concerned almost entirely with an amusingly diverse group of Americans temporarily sojourning there for equally diverse reasons. One of the most important is Blink Moran, middleweight prizefighter, in the portrayal of whose simple, solid, straightforward character Mr. Merwin has done a commendable piece of work. Admirably adroit and plausible he is also in developing the curious situation which comes about between Blink and Hilda, reaching it by gradual steps, each one logical and convincing. The entanglement which results will recall "Cashel Byron's Profession" to devotees of George Bernard Shaw, although the two episodes and the treatment of them are widely divergent. Mr. Shaw was intent upon setting forth a theory, while Mr. Merwin is modestly endeavoring only to portray the interaction between two strong characters and the response of temperament to its environment. The prizefight between Blink and the famous French champion which Hilda witnesses and Mr. Merwin describes with a graphic and picturesque and very human pen is an essential part of their story, of the influences that are at work upon them, but one wonders why the author allowed it to usurp so much space. For he gives it such extended attention as to put it out of proportion to its importance in the action.

The Hilda of the early pages of the book is a capable, practical woman, absorbed in "the bright, busy surface of her life," rather inclined to hardness and intolerance, and decidedly of conventional temperament. But the long untroubled deeps of her nature are stirred by the plight of an unfortunate morsel of a baby whom the "Texas Twisters" company of dancers are trying to take care of and by means of paregoric and candy are blundering toward an early grave. And after a time comes a call out of the past to which her moved and gentled heart makes quick response. Harris Dorsey comes subtly into the story. One learns of him through the briefest of far-off glimpses almost from the start. The long letter which Hilda receives from him after many years of silence is a really wonderful document in its revelation of character and in its unconscious setting forth of the heights to which a human soul may reach by making sacrifice and denial and service a means of enrichment of the heart. The chapters which tell of their meeting in London are unique in current fiction in the attitude of the two toward each other, but they have in them the feel of real life

THE GAME OF EMPIRES. By E. S. Van Zile, L. H. D. Moffat, Yard & Co. $1.25.

THE DOCTRINE OF INTERVENTION. By Henry G. Hodges, A. M. Princeton: The Banner Press. $1.50.

THE WAR FROM THIS SIDE. Editorials from The North American. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Co.

THE United States stands today the greatest and most conspicuous of the powers not involved in the great war. It has benefited by its geographical isolation and the diplomatic independence that has resulted from that, and so it may fairly hope to remain until the end, unaffected directly by the strife of peoples. It may hope, but it cannot be sure, and because of this uncertainty many patriotic Americans are today looking anxiously to the condition in which we are to play our part worthily in the world strife, should the call come.

One of the most remarkable of the books dealing with this subject is "The Game of Empires" by Dr. Edward S. Van Zile. He has written to prove, as Colonel Roosevelt has said in a letter prefixed to his volume that "preparedness for war is in reality preparedness against war," and he has done it by rehearsing the events of the last few months to show how the passions that have plunged Europe in bloodshed might produce the same effect in America or any other country.

As he writes, it is of course apparent enough that the sympathies of Dr. Van Zile are with the Allies entirely, but his object is not to thrash out the threadbare controversy concerning the responsibility for the war, but to show that those who trust in treaties or conventions are leaning upon a broken reed. Corsica for a time, he says, has conquered Galilee; Germany has intoxicated her soldiers with the dream of world empire as with hasheesh, and the war of wars is here.

Then, as Dr. Van Zile passes from the statement of the events of the last ten months to draw his lesson from them, he notes the similarity between gods of Germany and Japan. Efficiency seems the leading characteristic of both, and before the need of securing efficiency every restraint, religious, moral, or humanitarian, must give way. Yet America, he points out, has so far applied efficiency only to the arts of peace and the methods of business and not to preparation for war, and he expresses the hope that betrays a fear that surely the United States could never share the fate of the unhappy Koreans.

As he thinks of that peril Dr. Van Zile is led to an attack upon the present Administration. He asserts that the efficiency of the United States Navy has been in some mysterious fashion impaired, and he holds up to scorn "The Head Usher and his Assistant." He tells how President Wilson congratulated Congress in December that there was "no reason to fear that from any quarter our independence or the integrity of our territory is threatened," and then, in the next breath, went on to urge the importance of foreign commerce and the need of enlarging it, as though it were not that very foreign commerce which had been one of the potent causes that had stirred up the present war.

The President's speech, says Dr. Van Zile, and the attitude toward foreign affairs of his assistant, Mr. Bryan, caused a vague uneasiness throughout the nation at its unpreparedness for war, and it is to rouse this into action that he has written. His essays—for each of his chapters is cast in the form of an essay—his quotations from speakers and writers of note and his allegorical method of giving the event with which all are familiar a general significance, make the book well worth studying.

One may not agree with Dr. Van Zile that the institution of woman's suffrage would have a restraining effect upon such a war of ideals as this—for have not the women of the warring nations shown themselves at least as determined as the men?—but one can agree with him as he pronounces the Religion of Valor not more evil than the Religion of Avoidance. The Religion of Valor has driven Germans to live dangerously and to march to their destruction; the Religion of Avoidance has permitted men to shut their eyes to plain facts and shirk their responsibilities. Between them lies a golden mean, which Dr. Van Zile says the clear-minded, open-eyed, patriotic American should seek, so that he may stand sufficiently strong and sufficiently prepared to meet the dangers and duties they may bring him, ready to fulfill his lofty mission as a freeman.

From time immemorial nations have intervened in the affairs of others and for all time to come they are sure to continue to do so. At this present time, however, the problems involved in intervention are of peculiarly poignant interest to the United States by reason of her international relations. Last year she was intervening actively in Mexico; today she is doing her best to escape intervening in the great European war; next year she may find that she has been forced to intervene in both Mexico and Europe. Consequently the interesting study of the theory, the law and the morals of intervention, published by Henry G. Hodges of the University of Pennsylvania, as "The Doctrine of Intervention," is particularly timely.

In the first place Professor Hodges has examined the general principles of intervention, both political and non-political, and has discussed such subjects of direct interest to the United States as the neutralization of canals and intervention in behalf of oppressed nationalities and religions as the Jews. Then he goes on to consider special forms of intervention, such as the recognition of belligerency or independence, and comes down to an account from his point of view of the relations of modern states towards a number of the problems of current interest.

Thus he describes the origin and development of the Monroe Doctrine and points out that it has been now so long established that it has acquired, largely for selfish reasons, a much more ready acceptance from the statesmen of Europe. He admits that it usually involves an intervention to put down another intervention, but it is recognized as of the highest political importance. Mr. Hodges, however, admits that to the negative side of the doctrine has been added a positive side, the duty of the United States as it prevents European nations from intervening in American affairs to see that they are treated fairly, and he suggests that it might be well if the United States in fulfilling this function were to act in concert with some of the leading South American nations.

As Mr. Hodges reviews the policies of European States with regard to interventions, he does not acquit England from many interferences in the affairs of her neighbors when they seemed advisable to her, but it is against Germany he directs his strongest strictures. Non-intervention with her, he declares, has been unknown, and the great difficulty has been to find some pretext suffi-

The charm of Le Gallienne has never been more manifest than in the fresh, unhackneyed viewpoints displayed in these very human and wholly delightful papers. Among the titles are: The Lack of Imagination Among Millionaires, The Passing of Mrs. Grundy, The Persecutions of Beauty, An Old American Tow-Path, A Modern St. Francis, The Mystery of Fiona MacLeod, A Little Ghost in the Garden, Forbes-Robertson, etc.

The author's experience as a prisoner of war covered the days when the Confederacy was tottering, and the privations and unhealthy housing conditions of the prisoners were at their worst. He writes, however, not only without bitterness, but with a stoutness of soul that is heartening and a sense of humor that sends shaft after shaft of brightness through the gloom.

and real people and also they breathe much spiritual beauty.

The book is more than a mere picturing, vivid though that is, of a section of modern life or of a phase of modern womanhood. For it makes, in its single instance, an interpretation of the relation of the individual to life. When Hilda comes back to the department store to take up again the life, accepted now as her destiny, of the worker, the "honey bee," the year of stress and storm and tragedy through which she has passed has effected its transformation upon her. She has learned the need of giving as well as of taking, she is humbled in heart and enriched in soul, and she is ready, as she slips into the harness again, for a new and warmly human relation toward her fellow-workers, toward all with whom she comes in contact.

Mr. Merwin writes in a simple, direct style that apparently aims only to say clearly and trenchantly the essential things; and if sometimes it lacks in polish and dignity it is always graphic. And the story of modern life which it clothes is an interesting and significant tale, worth reading and worth thinking about afterward. It puts Mr. Merwin among the ranks of those who must be reckoned with when American novelists are under consideration.

ALICE AND A FAMILY

ALICE AND A FAMILY. By St. John G. Ervine. The Macmillan Company.

WHILE Mrs. William Nudds lay dying she asked Alice Corken to look after her family. For, as she explained, referring, of course, to her husband, "'E's that 'elpless!" Now, the family consisted of the above-mentioned Mr. Nudds, casual laborer; his thirteen-year-old son, Herbert, known as 'Erbie, and his three daughters, Jane Gertrude, Violet, and the as yet unnamed baby, whose arrival had caused the death of Mrs. Nudds. Moreover, Mr. Nudds had recently had "'a naccident" and seriously injured his arm, so that altogether the adoption of this family was quite a serious undertaking for a girl of about fourteen or fifteen. But Alice was entirely equal to the situation. In fact, we are thoroughly convinced that she could have managed a whole townful of families without any great difficulty. She began her care of the Nuddses by having a spirited encounter with the undertaker's assistant, who later exclaimed feelingly: "Ain't she a reg'lar one!" the result of which was that Mrs. Nudds's funeral was conducted with a simplicity that "scandalized East Street and the surrounding neighborhood," and incidentally saved the Nudds family from being plunged fathoms deep into debt. Of course, Mr. Nudds protested, exactly as 'Erbie had already done in the matter of the Post Office and the half sovereign, but Alice was firm. It was she who prevented the Nudds family from falling to pieces and placed it, so to speak, upon its feet. The way in which she did this forms the thread of the story.

As a picture of the lives of a section of the London poor, this novel somewhat resembles the work of W. Pett Ridge. It is anything but a dismal tale, although its characters regard fresh eggs for tea and meat every day at dinner as the very height of luxury. The key in which it is pitched is that of comedy and the reader who cannot chuckle over many of its pages must be pitiably devoid of that sense of humor which Mrs. Corken cultivated so sedulously, although, as she warned Bill Shoreham upon one memorable occasion, it was necessary for any one possessed of it to be extremely careful, lest they some day find themselves laughing "a noller laugh." Mrs. Corken was Alice's mother, and she was quite worthy of the distinction. True, East Street had once declared her to be "a narpy," but as East Street had not the very remotest idea of what a harpy was, the denunciation should not be taken too seriously. She was an excellent, very sensible woman, and was even willing than Shoreham should, as she expressed it, "jawr about the world when the eggs is boiled." For Shoreham was a Socialist, the son of a rich man and a Cambridge graduate, who had greatly excited East Street by coming there to live. Alice herself was inclined to think that when a man preferred to live in Walworth, who, if he chose, might live in Kensington, it was probably desirable, "in the interest not only of the man himself but of the entire community, that he should be put in some safe place." However, he proved useful in the matter of the insurance agent, and made a very practical suggestion about the all-important shop, in consideration of which Alice very kindly forgave him his eccentricities.

There is not a single character in the book that is not well portrayed, from 'Erbie, who so quickly learned the wisdom of yielding to Alice, to Keating, the van man, in whose "poor, limited brain there was a big vision of a reconciled world," and Mrs. Squibb, the possessor of pronounced opinions upon the beneficial effects of "a little drop"—opinions which she aired with such constancy that the reader cannot help agreeing with Mr. Nudds's statement that if her late husband "didn't commit murder, then 'e bloomin' well ought to 'ave, an' it ought to 'ave been 'er." But real as they all are, it is Alice who dominates the book. Shrewd and sensible, warm-hearted and sharp-tongued, literal and efficient, a born dictator, yet capable of stooping to diplomacy when she can achieve her end in no other way—how masterly was her use of that dreadful "stoo"!—it is very easy to understand why they all feared her a little, loved her a great deal and leaned upon her completely. Mr. Nudds once made a futile attempt at rebellion when her orders ran counter to his expressed declaration that he "didn't 'old with foreigners," but it was not long before tinned salmon and Mrs. Squibb brought him to terms. Of course Mr. Toop was quite right when he called her "a holy terror," and her methods with Jane Gertrude and Violet would probably have failed to win the approval of child culturists, though no one could deny that they were efficacious.

The book is very unlike "Mrs. Martin's Man," which was Mr. Ervine's introduction to the novel reading public. It is not so ambitious, and it is written in a different style, and in a very different vein. Its people are simpler, their feelings more on the surface; there are no such records of spiritual experience as may be found in the earlier published, though we suspect not earlier written, book. Both novels, however, are conscientious, artistic. The author apparently writes in both instances of what he knows; of a social environment with which he is thoroughly familiar. Alice and her adopted family are interesting, flesh-and-blood persons. They are not idealized, nor moralized over, nor used as the means of illustrating any especial doctrine; they are just presented, with clearness, simplicity, truth, and that charm which is the result of the large sympathy which sees and understands their pathos and their comicalness, their virtues and their failings, their prejudices and their generosities. St. John Ervine has firmly established his claim to a place in the ranks of those younger writers to whom we look for the worth-while novels of the future.

THE RIDDLE OF THE SANDS

THE RIDDLE OF THE SANDS. By Erskine Childers. Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.35 net.

AS indicated by the date of the Preface, the events related in "The Riddle of the Sands" belong to a year previous to 1903, when two young Englishmen, cruising among the sandy islands of the German coast, discover bit by bit a deep-laid and startlingly original plan for a German invasion of England. At once falling under suspicion in the matter of spying, these discoveries are not made without much thwarting and many perils. The story of these unfolds itself in a manner so leisurely and convincing that it is difficult to believe it other than a record of actual experience. Its maps and the frequent reference to them give still greater verisimilitude to the tale. In truth, although the incidents are largely fictitious, and a slender thread of romance runs through the book, its whole point and purpose is to demonstrate the menace of a German descent upon unprotected English coasts, and the method of its easy accomplishment. The Epilogue sums up and emphasizes the conclusions of the story. The author—once a clerk of Parliament and now a member of the British Aviation Corps—has made by the views set forth in this tale such a profound impression upon the Government that it has "actually altered the whole plan of England's military defense." So the publishers assert.

Of course, at the present crisis, the thesis of the book is one of profound interest, and the novel is well worth reading, were it for this alone. The author's reasoning is cogent, his conclusions irrisistible. Very noteworthy is his high estimate of the power, the prevision, and the energy of the German Government, as contrasted with Great Britain's apathy and lack of organization.

Every advantage, moral, material and geographical, possessed by Germany, is utilized to the utmost, and every disadvantage of our own turned to account against us. Two root principles pervade it, (the scheme of invasion,) perfect organization, perfect secrecy.

He describes Germany's "marvelous awakening in the last generation under the strength and wisdom of her rulers; her intense patriotic ardor; her seething industrial activity, and, most potent of all the forces that are molding modern Europe, her dream of a Colonial Empire, entailing her transformation from a land power to a sea power."

Like his hero, Davies, Mr. Childers has "not a particle of racial spleen in his composition." It is evident that Davies expresses his creator's sentiments when the frank young fellow exclaims:

"We can't talk about conquest and grabbing. We've collared a fair share of the world, and they've every right to be jealous. Let them hate us, and say so; it'll teach us to buck up, and that's what really matters.

He does not omit a deserved tribute to the ability and patriotism of the Kaiser, a "fine fellow . . . who works like a nigger for his country, and sees ahead."

Apart from the political significance of the book, "The Riddle of the Sands" is fiction of a high quality. Its style and its permeating atmosphere of the sea suggest Conrad; and, like Conrad, the author takes us so thoroughly with him that our hearts beat with those of the perplexed voyagers, and we even share the smells and flavors of their cramped little yacht. Robinson Crusoe itself is not more real than is this record of the deeds and dangers of the intrepid pair, at once suspecters and suspects.

THE BELOVED

THE BELOVED. By James Oppenheim. B. W. Huebsch.

THE tale of the courtesan who, redeemed through love, eventually rises to the most sublime heights of self-sacrifice, is one which has been told innumerable times. In poetry and legend, problem play, short story and novel, she has appeared and reappeared. It is therefore no surprise to meet her again in the person of Trixie, later Beatrice Dargan, the heroine of Mr. Oppenheim's new novel, "The Beloved." Trixie is a nameless child of the gutter, aged 18, in whose life there has been but one lovely thing—the memory of a golden-haired actress who petted her during a few short weeks spent in the country. Save for this one brief episode, her existence has been a prolonged horror. The underworld claimed her as soon as she was born, and held her fast until the hour when at Devlin's cabaret in the hot, smoke-filled cellar she first encounters Ralph Hardy, aged 21, who has just come from Massachusetts and the care of a gentle, exquisite, high-bred mother, to try his fortunes in New York as a poet and short-story writer. The little "movie" actress, "Trixie," half repels, half fascinates him. Presently he begins to divine her latent abilities, and it is he who first de-

DOSTOEVSKY

New Translation of "The House of the Dead"

THE HOUSE OF THE DEAD. By Fyodor Dostoevsky. From the Russian by Constance Garnett. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

THERE are a few books in every literature which carry an air of finality with them; they have covered the subject so fully, they are so completely its last word, that if a later author wishes to treat of it, he cannot hope to succeed except by frankly announcing himself as an imitator. "Robinson Crusoe" is pre-eminently a book of this sort, so is "Don Quixote," and so is "The Vicar of Wakefield." To the list—which might of course be considerably extended—must be added Dostoevsky's "House of the Dead."

Though the present translation by Constance Garnett is the first really adequate one, the book is already fairly well known to English and American readers, and has proven of peculiar interest to them. In fact, there is something about this long, garrulous, simple, poignant "document", which makes it much more closely of kin to the elder English novel than is nine-tenths of our present fiction, supposedly in the line of direct descent.

One wonders occasionally, by the way, about the legitimacy of that descent, but this is neither the time nor the place for its discussion. We merely throw the question out, in passing, for the consideration of literary eugenists.

If we fail to see the relationship—for it was not altogether accident which related "The House of the Dead" in the reviewer's mind with two eighteenth century English novels and a Spanish one which especially appealed to the eighteenth century English reader—it may be because we are accustomed to regard Dostoevsky, and with truth, as a great psychologist, while Defoe and Goldsmith would very likely have repudiated the title, had it been invented then. But the quality preceded the label, and the man who recorded the eventful life of Moll Flanders knew the human heart as accurately, though perhaps not so extensively, as the historian of Raskolnikov's Sonia.

In one sense, "The House of the Dead" is a less important work than "Crime and Punishment" or "The Brothers Karamazov"; in another sense it is even more important. For, though in itself rather a fragment of autobiography than a novel, relating as it does in terrible and dispassionate detail the story of four years' prison service in Siberia, it does much to explain the obscurities and incongruities in the novels. We have most of us wondered at Dostoevsky's tender-hearted murderers, marveled how such bad people could possibly be so good and such good people so extraordinarily bad, and finally concluded that the Russian character must be very, very different from ours. In "The House of the Dead" we are brought down to bed rock, as it were; past the differences in the social strata, past even the fissures that divide race from race, down to the common humanity which, for some reason, reveals in misery, rather than in prosperity and happiness, its basic oneness. And having once realized the Russian character at its lowest terms as not intrinsically different from our own, we are able to build up again, in a way, to the strange, emotional, half-devil, half-angel souls that throng the pages of the novels, with a better understanding of them and a closer sympathy. To any reader who is inclined to make a study of Dostoevsky we should recommend a reading of "The House of the Dead" first of all, and a frequent reference back to it afterward, for in it is to be found the germ of all his later work.

From another point of view the universality of "The House of the Dead" is shown by the fact that this record of an experience of over sixty years ago, in the depths of a wilderness, under a system worse than mediaeval, might have been written today, in New York State, as far as the pertinence of its conclusions upon crime, its causes and remedies, are concerned. Sentences like the following have a very modern ring:

> All these people were kept at work by force, consequently they were idle, consequently they were demoralized; if they had not been depraved beforehand, they became so in prison. * * *
> Prisons and penal servitude do not reform the criminal; they only punish him and protect society from further attacks on its security. In the criminal, prison and the severest hard labor only develop hatred, lust for forbidden pleasures, and a fearful levity. But I am firmly convinced that the belauded system of solitary confinement attains only false, deceptive, external results. It drains the man's vital sap, enervates his soul, cows and enfeebles it, and then holds up the morally withered mummy, half imbecile, as a model of penitence and reformation. * * *
> Idleness alone would have developed in the convict here criminal propensities of which he had no idea before. Without labor, without lawful normal property man cannot live; he becomes depraved, and is transformed into a beast.

Yet, in spite of Dostoevsky's views, so far in advance of his time, in favor of humanizing the penal system, he never sentimentalized the criminal, as some of our latter-day theorists are in danger of doing. He emphasizes the fact that though "the convict likes it much better when one trusts him, one may even win his affection by doing so," still they "do not like to be treated too familiarly and too softly by their officers. They want to respect those in authority over them, and too much softness makes them cease to respect them. The convicts like their commanding officer to have decorations, too; they like him to be presentable, they like him to be in favor with some higher authority, they like him to be strict and important and just, and they like him to keep up his dignity."

He also points out the trait, common to all criminals, of contempt for the honest man. On one occasion the author questioned a famous robber, who talked freely enough until he discovered his interrogator's object:

> When he realized that I was trying to get at his conscience and to discover some sign of penitence in him, he glanced at me with great contempt and haughtiness, as though I had suddenly in his eyes become a foolish little boy, with whom it was impossible to discuss things as you would with a grown-up person. There was even a sort of pity for me to be seen in his face. A minute later he burst out laughing at me, a perfectly open-hearted laugh free from any hint of irony, and I am sure that, recalling my words when he was alone, he laughed again to himself, many times over, perhaps.

And again,

> It is remarkable that the convicts rather looked down on peasants, though half of them were of the peasant class.

A still commoner trait is that of self-justification:

> In the course of several years I never saw one sign of repentance among these people, not a trace of despondent brooding over their crime, and the majority of them inwardly considered themselves absolutely in the right.

Of course, this inclination is not peculiar to convicts, but wherever we find it in combination with criminal desires, it constitutes the true danger to society. It is not so much what the criminal does, as his state of mind, that threatens. The man, whoever he may be, convict or not, who considers himself cleverer than his neighbor because he can destroy instead of build up, and who, when he is caught destroying something valuable, whether it be a man's life or a woman's ideal, and is made to suffer for it, pities himself and blames society, is a rotten branch that only fire can cleanse.

Yet in spite of the interest and value attaching to "The House of the Dead" as a social document, it remains pre-eminently a work of art. The infinite detail, which, might become wearisome in a novel, in this simple record grows, little by little, into a structure of life. Not only the writer but the host of his fellow "unfortunates" become as vivid to us as our own friends. It is a depressing, even a horrible, history, but agony is never piled on for the sake of the thrill. It remains a sober, balanced narrative; and if there is incorporated in it a tale as monstrous as that of "Akulka's Husband," it is related so simply, so wholly without sensationalism, so exactly—to hark back to our first comparison—in the best manner of Defoe, that it takes its place naturally and without violence among a host of other episodes, some sad, some tragical, some farcical.

One of Dostoevsky's critics has said that no human being is commonplace to him—which comes very close to the secret of his power. For a man has to be a long time dead to be really commonplace. As long as there is life in him, whether of the body or the soul or of reputation, he is bound to affect us, and Dostoevsky realized this, and makes us realize it.

AMERICA AND WAR

ciently elastic to be stretched into a casus belli.

For Mexico a long chapter is necessary, and Mr. Hodges has reviewed her history from the time of her independence from Spain. He quotes statistics to show the preponderance of American over other foreign interests in her commerce and population, and he insists upon the proximity of the two countries to show that the United States must ever have a peculiar right to be considered in Mexican affairs. Having established this, Mr. Hodges repudiates the idea that we can stand by and watch our neighbors go to rack and ruin without action, but he is not convinced that the time for intervention is come yet. When it does come it will be a duty, not a privilege, and he holds that, with the aid of other representative nations of this hemisphere, we shall be required to step in and restore order.

Finally, Mr. Hodges takes up the instances of intervention that were seen in Europe last Summer. Russia was right, he concludes, to intervene for Serbia, and England for Belgium; Austria was wrong to intervene in Serbia, while France, England, and Japan merely carried out the provisions of the treaties by which they were bound. As for the United States, she stands today in a position of peculiar delicacy and is forced to deal with frequent unwarranted acts on the part of the belligerents with as much self-restraint as she can. How it will turn out it is impossible to say, but Mr. Hodges suggests we may well remember the remark of Baron de Nolken to John Adams during the Napoleonic wars: "Sir, I take it for granted that you will have sense enough to see us in Europe cut each other's throats with a philosophical tranquillity."

In any history of the war a consideration of the effect on American public opinion of the events as they occurred will be of considerable value to the historian. Even now, as we look back over the crowded months that are past, it is interesting to recall the different currents of feeling that swept over us as we heard of this or that development.

Naturally, the place where these varying influences are recorded is the daily newspaper, and in no part of it so clearly as among the editorials. Consequently, the collection of editorials from The Philadelphia North American is welcome. It has been published under the title of "The War from This Side," and it should prove of much value to those who are studying the great conflict or merely wish to recall quickly the course it followed.

DANTE'S DIVINE COMEDY

TRANSLATED BY HENRY JOHNSON, Director of the Bowdoin Museum of Fine Arts.

As a member of the faculty of Bowdoin College, Professor Johnson is in a sense a successor of Longfellow, who served as professor there. It is therefore notable that he should have followed Longfellow's example in translating the DIVINE COMEDY into English blank verse. He has succeeded remarkably in his attempt to render Dante's meaning as definitely as possible. His style is both clear and flexible, and his work offers a new and better opportunity to enjoy one of the masterpieces of the world to those of us for whom the original is not available.

HARPER'S BOOKS

The Turmoil

By Booth Tarkington

First as to the sales in thirty-eight places out of forty-two. These figures are the impartial dealers' reports to the May Bookman, regarded as official by the entire trade. For three months "The Turmoil" has been the best selling book in America.

The Primrose Ring

By Ruth Sawyer

"If you have a 'foolish sentimental' fondness for children, not only your own, but all the little folk who come stumbling into this awfully complex world of ours, step into the primrose ring, reach across it to this little heroine, and let her give you back again the heart of a child which you have lost somewhere along the Road of Growing-Old-and-Wise."

The Life-Builders

By Elizabeth Dejeans

Who is the more conservative—man or woman—when it is a question of home and marriage? This is the question which the author asks, the theme of her clean and earnest romance of a vital, gracious and graceful woman, who dreamed of marriage based on genuine love upon which husband and wife should build toward an ideal future. The author's handling of the question is unusual, but full of insight into the differences in masculine and feminine nature.

Bred of the Desert

By Marcus Horton

"Here at last is a story about a horse worthy to be classed with some of the notable interpretations of dog character and life in fiction. The sympathy and the verisimilitude with which it is written ought to bring it warm and quick welcome from all lovers of the horse, while the interesting story it tells with skill and color, humor and emotional suspense, may be trusted to find for it many admirers among those who like a well-told, absorbing tale."—N. Y. Times.

Pals First

By Francis Perry Elliott

If you are one of the many who are especially fond of mystery or detective stories, take advice and get a copy of "Pals First." This is a most baffling mystery story in which you either make up your mind quickly how the mystery is solved, or are convinced that the next page will disclose it. Nevertheless, you will have to read as far as page 321 before the author solves it for you, and then you will find it is not at all as you had imagined it would be. In addition to this, there is a very sweet love story.

CURRENT HISTORY

OUT of the avalanche of books and pamphlets already produced by the war, it is not likely that more than a small proportion of either will recommend themselves as worthy of study or even casual perusal to the future historian. Stupendous events create automatically a plethora of literary material, from which the contemporary writer finds it difficult to select just that vital substance that will appeal to a posterity anxious to obtain a clarifying view of the period through which we are passing. It is doubtful, however, if the war has furnished so far a more important document in military history than Field Marshal Sir JOHN FRENCH'S official report of the battle of Neuve Chapelle contained in the May number of THE NEW YORK TIMES CURRENT HISTORY. Coming from the commander of the British expeditionary forces, this report becomes an inside view of this decisive engagement, and, aside from its summary of the action, is particularly interesting as an expression of the highest expert opinion on the factors that promise victory or defeat in the present combat. We have heard, of course, from various sources and in a sufficiently vague way that the war is a test of endurance. But on just what lines of actual fighting the test is to be made is not, as a rule, explained. Sir JOHN FRENCH, summing up the Neuve Chapelle experience, indicates the clue to the whole matter:

> In war as it is today, between civilized nations armed to the teeth with the present deadly rifle and machine gun, heavy casualties are absolutely unavoidable. For the slightest undue exposure the heaviest toll is exacted. The power of defense conferred by modern weapons is the main cause for the long duration of the battles of the present day, and it is this fact which mainly accounts for such loss and waste of life. Both one and the other can, however, be shortened and lessened if attacks can be supported by a most efficient and powerful force of artillery available; but an almost unlimited supply of ammunition is necessary, and a most liberal discretionary power as to its use must be given to artillery commanders. I am confident that this is the only means by which great results can be obtained with a minimum of loss.

Authoritative articles on other aspects of the war are given in this number of THE CURRENT HISTORY in accounts of the surrender of Przemysl, the battle of the Dardanelles, the final installment of the French official history of the battle of the Marne, the drink problem in England, American neutrality, pan-American relations, &c.

THAT excellent sailor, J. E. PATTERSON, who left a nautical career to win the laurels that have deservedly come to him in the field of fiction, objects to the classification of Mr. YOUNG E. ALLISON'S "Derelict, a Reminiscence of 'Treasure Island,'" published recently in these columns, as a "Chantey." Mr. PATTERSON, writing to The London Book Monthly, in which the "Derelict" was reprinted, "admits readily that as a landsman's rum-and-blood ballad of the sea Mr. ALLISON'S is the finest I have ever seen." But it is not a "Chantey." Chanties, we are told, except for the Elizabethan ones, are invariably "made by sailormen and cottonstuffers" merely as "rhythmic helps to work"—a statement, by the way, corroborated by some interesting examples given in "The Harbor" by Mr. POOLE. Here, for instance, is the beginning of a true Chantey, the best of the kind, declares Mr. PATTERSON, that he has ever heard:

> (solo) "Today I saw two little black pigs.—
> (chorus) To me way-O, Maria!
> (solo) Today I saw two little black pigs.—
> (chorus) To me way-O, brandy!
> Brandy br-andy, br-r-r-andy!"

Of course, Mr. ALLISON'S "Derelict" is not in the least like that. It has, moreover, certain "literary" touches that are distinctly without the savor of the sea. Mr. PATTERSON, in this aspect of the case, finds subject for merriment in the appearance—in a Chantey—of such terms as "murk sunset," "scullion," "twice ten turns of a hawser's bight," "whist," &c. All of which means that "Derelict" cannot be considered a "Chantey." It remains a fine seafaring ballad that carries on the spirit of STEVENSON'S four lines excellently—and that is, perhaps, a more desirable distinction than to be "a rhythmic help to work."

THERE is probably more idealism—we are not at all sure that the term is accurately descriptive—than the average reader will find it easy to assimilate in the view of the war given by Mr. WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS in his article "Why?" appearing in the current number of The North American Review. "My own neutrality," Mr. HOWELLS assures us, "is of such measure and make that I would have our nation bear everything from the belligerents short of invading our shores after sinking all our ships." But we are not to suppose from this theoretical instance of forbearance that Mr. HOWELLS is neutral in his sympathies. "Germany is wrong," he declares, "and England is right; and that is why we must wish England well, whatever becomes of our questions and protests." This positive attitude is further emphasized by Mr. HOWELLS'S summing up of his position:

> Meanwhile the great Because which answers my Why is that England is—
> the land that freemen till,
> That sober-suited Freedom chose,
> The land where, girt with friends or foes,
> A man may speak the things he will—
> and that in Germany he may not without danger of going to jail for it.

ACCORDING to the program for its annual convention to be held in New York this week, the American Booksellers' Association will take for its theme this year "Selling More Books." Fifteen years ago this organization was started for the purpose of raising the business of bookselling to a higher degree of efficiency than it had hitherto enjoyed. The need for concerted effort and the enlightenment that comes from a discussion of topics of mutual interest had appeared to the first promoters of the movement matters of vital importance to the continuance of bookselling in this country as a profitable occupation. Since its initial meeting the association has steadily grown, and, judging from the discussions held during previous conventions, its influence becomes increasingly stimulating and widespread. Like every other business, the selling of books involves problems of an essentially practical nature. In the consideration of these problems it is hoped that the American Booksellers will enjoy as pleasant and profitable a session of their association this year as they have in the past.

ALTHOUGH it is not likely that the "Imaginary Conversations" will ever lose their unique position in English literature, one hears but little nowadays of their leonine author, W. S. LANDOR, the poet's poet, as some of the critics have called him. He is the subject of a reminiscent sketch by the Marchesa PERUZZI DE' MEDICI, appearing in The Cornhill Magazine. The Marchesa was a young girl at the period of which she writes—she was EDITH STORY then—but she draws a vivid portrait of the pathetic old man who was given asylum in her father's villa near Siena, brought thither as a sort of outcast from his own home by BROWNING. LANDOR was, of course, as the Marchesa pictures him, as hopelessly at variance with the modern world as he was with his own household. But his unwavering championship of pagan classicism exerted a potent influence on those literary contemporaries who knew and revered him, extending through them into the next generation.

ANSWERS BY THE EDITOR

D. P. C.—Can you tell me anything in regard to poems by Henry Vaughan, (Silurist,) also information of the author?

Henry Vaughan and his twin brother, Thomas, were born on April 17, 1622, at Newton-by-Usk, Brecknockshire, Wales. They were descended from Sir Roger Vaughan of Bredwardine, who fell at Agincourt. Henry left Oxford without a degree, and spent some time in London in studying law at the wish of his father, but ultimately turned his attention to medicine. He died on April 23, 1695. He was twice married. He published a small volume entitled "Poems With the Tenth Satyre of Juvenal Englished" in 1646, and another volume, "Olor-Iscanus," a collection of some select poems and translations, deriving its title from the principal poem on the River Usk, was published in 1651 by his brother Thomas. In 1650 appeared "Silex Scintillans, or Sacred Poems and Private Ejaculations," by Henry Vaughan, Silurist. In 1655 a second part of "Silex Scintillans" appeared. It contains the crown of all his poetry, "They Are All Gone Into the World of Light." He had also published a small volume of devotions, "The Mount of Olives," in 1654, and "Flores Solitudinis," three religious tracts, in 1652. In 1655 he also published "Hermetical Physick." In 1678, in "Thalia Redivivus," by "J. W.," appeared other poems by him. His position among British poets is not only high, but in some respects unique. The title of "Silurist," which he assumed, had a topographical significance.

H. M. A.—I am interested to know something about the life of Edward Sheldon, playwright, author of "Salvation Nell," "The Nigger," and "Romance."

Edward Sheldon was born in Chicago Feb. 4, 1886, and is the son of Theodore and Mary (Strong) Sheldon. He was graduated from Harvard in 1907. Besides the plays you mention he has written "The Boss," "The Princess Zim Zim," "Egypt," and "The High Road." He is a resident of this city.

M. G. O.—Can you tell me the probable value of the works of Alexander Pope, in six volumes, well bound in brown leather, printed upon tough paper for J. Balfour, Edinburgh, in 1764?

It is worth about $5.

L. D. A.—Can you tell me the value of a copy of the first issue of The New York Herald in good condition?

It is not of special value. Nos. 1-165, in one volume, brought $12.50 at the Frederickson sale.

G. H.—Can you tell me of what value is The London Register, 1702, January to June; The Edinburgh Magazine, Vol. II., July to December, 1785, and "The Professor at the Breakfast Table," 1859?

"The Professor at the Breakfast Table," first edition, was published in 1860, and is worth from $3 to $3.50. The newspaper and the magazine are not of special value.

ANSWERS FROM READERS

OLIVE WHITE.—In reply to "H. H. P." in THE BOOK REVIEW of April 18, I would say that the poem inquired for, "The Sobbing Sea," was written by the late Francis S. Smith, one of the proprietors of Street & Smith's Weekly. It was published in book form in the early 80s.

ADELA F. SMITH.—In your issue of April 18, C. K. McDermott asks for the author of the following quotation:

Merciful wind, sing me a hoarse rough song,
For there is other music made tonight
That I would fain not hear.

The lines are by Jean Ingelow in her poem, "Brothers and a Sermon," and can be found in any collection of her poems.

A. McKIE.—Referring to the inquiry of "G. L. G." for the poem entitled "Mother," it is as follows:

It is a wonderful thing, a mother;
Other folks can love you, but only your mother understands.
She works for you, looks after you, loves you,
Forgives you anything you may do, understands you,
And then the only thing bad she ever does to you is to die and leave you.

The author of this poem is Baroness von Hutten.

Answers to this appeal have also been received from Howard Raymond, New York; Martha M. Adams, Flushing, L. I.; Frederick N. Boschen, Montreal, Canada; Reginald A. Kenney, Utica, N. Y.; John MacDonald, Holyoke, Mass.; Mrs. J. Campbell Smith, Orange, N. J.; Anna A. Kistinger, New Rochelle, N. Y., and Mrs. Katharine Murray Lawton, Middletown, Conn.

L. C. A.—In reply to the query of "S. F. B." in THE BOOK REVIEW of April 18, would say that the poem, "The Mother Job," is by Jane Burr, and is as follows:

It really isn't hard to be a mother,
There really isn't very much to do,
The days are just exactly like each other—
You simply shut your eyes and wander through!

For six o'clock is time enough for rising,
And getting all the children washed and dressed,
And breakfast cooked—it really is surprising,
But mothers never seem to need a rest.

The lunches must be packed and jackets rounded,
And everybody soothed and sent to school.
To say that mother rushes is unfounded—
She's nothing more to manage, as a rule.

Unless it is to finish piles of sewing,
And cook and wash and iron and scrub and sweep,
To order food and keep the furnace going—
And then perhaps to hide herself and weep!

And when at last she's tucked them under covers,
And seen to doors that Dad's forgot to lock,
Triumphantly, at midnight, she discovers,
She's nothing more to do till six o'clock.

A copy of this poem was also received from "A. F. C. L.," Hartford, Conn.

E. D. S.—The poem asked for by E. G. Frank is "The Queen's Marie," and may be found in "The Oxford Book of English Verse," where it is No. 375. The stanza quoted is the nineteenth of the long poem, which is printed as anonymous, and runs as follows:

Yestreen the Queen had four Maries,
The night she'll hae but three;
There was Marie Seaton and Marie Beaton,
And Marie Carmichael, and me.

Miss Caroline Bensel has written in reply to the appeal of E. G. Frank that the lines quoted above can be found in the poem entitled "Marie Hamilton," in "Legendary Ballads of England and Scotland," compiled and edited by John S. Roberts, published by Frederick Warne & Co., London, England. Marie Hamilton, according to the ballad, was one of the four Maries attending Mary, Queen of Scots, at Holyrood, and was hanged in Edinburgh for a crime. Lady Wardlaw of Pitreavie, who died in 1727, and who wrote "Sir Patrick Spens" and other ballads, was the author.

In the "Book of Scottish Poetry," edited by Sir George Douglas, there is an anonymous poem entitled "Lament of the Queen's Marie," which is based on the fate of Marie Hamilton, and which runs as follows:

"O ye mariners, mariners, mariners,
That sail upon the sea,
Let not my father nor mother to wit,
The death that I maun die!"

When she cam to the Netherbow port,
She laughed loud laughters three;
But when she cam to the gallows foot,
The tear blinded her e'e.

"Yestreen the Queen had four Maries,
The night she'll hae but three;
There was Marie Seton, and Marie Beaton,
And Marie Carmichael and me."

Information about the poem was also received from Norma B. Kasti, New York; Lillian Cassow, Douglas Crawford, Andover, Mass.; "B. P. H.," Waterbury, Conn.; Adrienne C. Soldin, Ridgewood, N. J.; Leila Taylor, New York; "N. G. T.," Westmount, Quebec; M. B. Gookin, Boston, Mass.; A. W. Morford, New Monmouth, N. J.; G. H. B. Nicolson, New York, and M. C. Kimball, Waterbury, Conn.

APPEALS TO READERS

A. D.—Can any of your correspondents inform me where I can find a poem called, I think, "A Thousand Years Ago," the first verse beginning:

Thou and I in spiritland a thousand years ago.

E. S. H.—I would very much appreciate information as to where the following quotation can be found, also the author's name:

That you shall find the lodges of the wise,
The farthest camp of the delightful fires,
By marching two by two, not one by one.

J. O. H.—Can any of your readers give the authors of the two poems or songs quoted herewith:

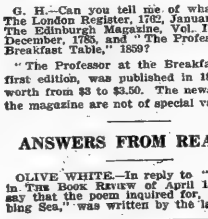
All the world is glad, my Love,
And all the world is fair;
Scented are all the woodland ways,
And golden-rimmed the lengthening days,
And oh! the nights are rare.

Six purple violets
Hanging in a row,
Carrying good wishes
Everywhere they go.

H. R. H.—Somewhere in the Centennial days, (1876-1885,) a pleasant bit of verse was published telling, as I remember it, how a little girl tossed a rose to the French General Rochambeau as he rode by her door. It began:

It was many and many a year ago,
That the General Count de Rochambeau, &c.

I thought it was in St. Nicholas, but thus far I have not been able to find it. Can any of your readers help me?



A novel by an unknown.

"Inferno" I may as well show what I mean by quoting a dozen lines from that:

Half-way upon the journey of our life
I roused to find myself within a forest
In darkness, for the straight way had been lost.
And, oh! how painful telling what it was,
This forest wild and rough, hard to pass through.
The very thought of which renews my fear!
So bitter is it, death is scarcely more;
But yet, to treat of the good that I found there,
I speak of other things that there I saw.

What Dante wrote was:

Nel mezzo del cammin di nostra vita
Mi ritrovai per una selva oscura,
Che la diritta via era smirrita.
E quanto a dir qual era è cosa dura
Questa selva selvaggia ed aspra e forte
Che nel pensier rinnova la paura:
Tanto è amara che poco è più morte:
Ma, per trattar del ben ch'i'vi trovai,
Dirò dell' altre cose ch'io v'ho scorte.

The fidelity to word is most remarkable, while the obvious change in tense offers a striking illustration for correct comparison between Tuscan expression and our own. Let the reader familiar with the happiest and most subtle tropes of the original turn to them and I think he will read with satisfaction, if with no stronger emotion, Professor Johnson's rendering. For example, a few lines further on in the same canto:

Allor fu la paura un poco queta
Che nel lago del cor m'era durata
La notte ch'io passai con tanta pieta.

Which our translator gives:

Then was the fear a little quieted,
Which in my heart's lake had not ceased throughout
The night that I had spent so piteously.

Or, taking the closing stanza of the Fifth Canto, the last line of which has been so often admired by critics because the words, their position, and their cadence suggest by sound as well as by meaning the falling of a man already dead:

Mentre che l'uno spirito questo disse,
L'altro piangeva sì, che di pietade
Io venni meno sì com' io morisse;
E caddi, come corpo morto cade.

While the one spirit had been saying this,
The other wept so bitterly, that I,
As I had died, for very pity swooned;
And fell, as falls the body of one dead.

Cary gives the passage:

* * * While thus one spirit spake,
The other wail'd so sorely, that heart-
struck
I, through compassion fainting, seem'd not far
From death, and like a corse fell to the ground.

And Longfellow:

And all the while one spirit uttered this,
The other one did weep so, that, for pity,
I swooned away as if I had been dying,
And fell, even as a dead body falls.

And Parsons:

* * * She stopped—
The other ghost so moaned, that pity
struck
My senses numb, and like a corpse I dropped.

And finally Plumptre:

And while one spirit told the story, still
The other wept so sore, that, pitying, I Fainted away as though my grief would kill.
And fell, as falls a dead man, heavily.

But Professor Johnson's publication celebrates an anniversary other than that of Dante's birth—the end of the first centennial of American Dante scholarship. The fifteenth annual report of the Dante Society of Cambridge, Mass., published in 1896, contains "An Historical and Bibliographical Study" of Dante in America. An "American Dante Bibliography" which is appended shows the record of over 500 publications dealing with the poet written by Americans and printed in this country during the nineteenth century. Since then the number of Dante publications has been nearly doubled, so that the century closes with around 1,000. I doubt if any country, unless it be Italy, can show so many within the same period.

What has been the inspiration for this mass of literature, particularly that which has been of some use to the student? A century ago modern languages had not been placed upon the curriculum of any American college. In society an occasional French, Spanish, or Italian adventurer was captured, and for a time held classes in his mother tongue until a more lucrative position as dancing or riding master opened to him.

One of these adventurers was Lorenzo da Ponte, a Venetian. Already famous as the librettist of Mozart, he took his mission more seriously than did his after colleagues. A versatile, temperamental, and magnetic genius, he taught the men and women of New York society and then became a professor without salary at Columbia College—the first Lecturer on Dante in this country. Through him the College Library laid the foundations of its Italian library and through him the Library of Congress secured a rare and superb copy of the "Commedia." It is worthy of note that he taught his pupils Italian from the pages of Dante. Aside from several comments and translations which he succeeded in having published in the local press of his time, he translated into Italian terza rima Byron's "The Prophecy of Dante," which was published in 1821 with a prefatory letter to Lord Byron and a dedication to Miss Julia Livingston. Just before he died in this city in 1838, at the age of 89, it was his proud boast to write: "In twenty-eight years I have instructed 2,500 persons in my language, which I and none other introduced in America." The last phrase he emphasized by having it printed: "Che I O, E NON ALTRI, introdussi in America."

A little before da Ponte's death, Pietro Maroncelli, the fellow prisoner of Silvio Pellico at Spielberg, was teaching Italian at Cambridge. It is significant that one of his pupils was the mother of Charles Eliot Norton. Through Maroncelli's influence Pietro Bachi, a man with a mystery, but beloved by all with whom he came in contact, was appointed instructor in Italian at Harvard College in 1826. His work is said to have been an invaluable supplement to the lectures by Professor George Ticknor and Ticknor's successor, Longfellow, both of whom were serious and enthusiastic lovers and teachers of Dante. After them came Lowell and Norton, the former famous for his essay on the poet and the latter for his translations, and both for the gift of imparting a lasting appreciation of their subject to their students.

Two other Americans whose work is perhaps better known in Italy than America were Richard Henry Wilde and Thomas W. Parsons, the latter of whom I have already mentioned in regard to his translation of "The Commedia," which unfortunately he never lived to complete. Wilde made translations of several of Dante's sonnets and wrote a "Life and Times of Dante," which to this day has found no publisher. He is chiefly famous, however, for his discovery of the Bargello portrait of Dante in Florence in 1840. He was a dilettante rather than a scholar. Parsons was both dilettante and scholar, besides being a poet. Thus while he often labored diligently to make clear a Dantesque obscurity he could not always refrain from stamping it with his own individuality.

Four notable contributions were sent out from America to Florence on the occasion of the six hundredth anniversary of Dante's birth in 1865. They were Norton's essay, "On the Original Portraits of Dante"; Botta's "Dante as Philosopher, Patriot, and Poet"; Longfellow's "Inferno," and Parson's "Seventeen Cantos of the Inferno." Italians have paid Parsons high tribute for his work.

In these later days the study of Italian has become so common at American institutions of learning, and there are so many Italians among us, that it would be unjust to cite a few names and ignore others whose influence on American Dante scholarship has been perhaps as great, although performed less conspicuously. Most of their names are to be found upon the membership list of the Dante Society of Cambridge, Mass., whose annual reports and monumental concordances have aroused the admiration and esteem of the scholars of Italy. And although Harvard, Yale, and Columbia have magnificent biblioteche dantesche, it will injure no one's vanity to say that the Willard Fiske collection at Cornell University surpasses them all, both in rarity and usefulness.

LATEST FICTION

clares that she can if she pleases become a famous actress. Which of course is her ultimate destiny.

There are big possibilities in the theme, and Mr. Oppenheim seems to have had a fine conception of the character of fierce, passionate, uncompromising Trixie—a conception which he has not succeeded, to use the theatrical phrase, in getting over. The trouble with the book is that it is written throughout in too ecstatic a key; when the big moments come there is nothing left with which to lift them above the rest; it is all on one rhapsodic level. There are rhapsodies over youth and love, the movies, New York by night, the ocean, the universe at large, the crowds at Coney Island, &c., with scarce a chance to breathe between them. Taken alone, some of these would be good; coming as they do one after another, without pause and without rest, the general effect which they produce is hysterical rather than lyrical. This would not be a matter of any great importance were it not for the talent which the author undoubtedly possesses. When he drew wise, big-hearted Dr. Rast, he proved that he could create character, but Trixie is written about in a way which makes her merely a creature out of a phantasmagoria. There is good stuff in this novel, but it is lost in the multiplicity of more or less ecstatic outpourings.

THE YELLOW CLAW

THE YELLOW CLAW. By Sax Rohmer. New York: McBride, Nast & Co. $1.35.

A DETECTIVE story with new and weird settings is "The Yellow Claw," fearsome as well as mystifying. Its action takes place in London, but much of it deals with an underground region of mystery, crime, and gorgeous trappings. From that hidden corner Oriental vice reaches out a yellow claw and touches, numbs, and kills people of high station; sending a stream of poison through streets and homes.

A famous novelist is sitting in his study hard at work in the middle of the night, when his door bell rings and in rushes a woman who tries to tell him something, but faints in the middle of the sentence. He hurries out for help and in five minutes returns to find the woman choked to death beside his study table, where she had tried to write her message but had left only some disconnected words, "your wife" and "Mr. King." Who this "Mr. King" is and what he is doing, it is soon perceived, furnish the mystery of the story. A little later it is found that he has some connection with what the detective calls "a swell dope shop," which after much labor and nosing about is unearthed in what had purported to be the premises of a ginger importing concern. A labyrinth of cellars, which in centuries past had been the vaults or crypts of a monastery, has been fitted up with Oriental luxury and magnificence, and the Chinese master of the place has sent out his lures and gathered in customers from the social circles of wealth and position. So much they find, but "Mr. King" is still a mystery.

It is a good detective story, having the necessary swift action, perilous and complicated happenings, and plot of mystery. But, in addition to these things, it has uncanny developments, touches of the lore of mystic Eastern cults, Oriental color in the midst of drab London, that gives it a certain exotic, horrifying atmosphere.

BAR-G RANCH

STEVE OF THE BAR-G RANCH. By Marion Reid-Girardot. New York: Hearst's International Library Company. $1.

With its scene laid among the mountains and plains of Colorado, "Steve of the Bar-G Ranch" tells a story of cowboy activities, work and play, love and life, as these things were in the days of the recent past, while the big ranches still pastured their droves of cattle and the farmer and the barb-wire fence had hardly ventured beyond the eastern slope of the Rockies. The aim of the author has been more to make a true and graphic picture of that life than to tell a closely woven story. He has provided plenty of stirring incident, by means of which he develops a plot of some complication, but he narrates these events with such detail as to make his pages a panorama of cowboy life rather than the moving picture of swift action along whose lines most authors of Western stories fashion their tales of ranch-life.

The author says that many of the incidents in his novel are from life as he himself saw it in the cowboy West of a few years ago, and that some of his characters are taken from real individualities whom he once knew. Nearly all of his people do have this tang of reality, and the accounts of cowboy sports and diversions and incidents of ranch life seem to be faithful and graphic pictures. The story is concerned with the rivalry of two brothers in love, in ranch sports, and, indeed, in all the phases of their life and of the almost tragic consequences to which it led. A teasing, coquettish young woman helps matters along. A great number and variety of characters take part in the action, and the story as a whole moves with much dash and go and is full of the piquant flavor of the life its describes.

THE PRETENDER

THE PRETENDER. A Story of the Latin Quarter. By Robert W. Service. Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.35 net.

An affluent and facile author of best-sellers becomes weary of both his fame and his fortune, and leaving them behind, takes passage in the steerage of an Italian steamer; then, with a new pen-name, he begins his literary life over again in the Bohemian world of Paris. He tells his own story; and what he thinks of himself is obvious from the title. His readers will judge him more leniently. He is afflicted with an incurable sentimental-tommy-ness, at once making a drama of every situation with the Ego as the protagonist. A pretender he undoubtedly is, but—as is, perhaps, the case with all his kind—he is a pretender first to himself. Many and varied are the parts he plays. In affairs of the heart he is the pursued more often than the pursuer, but he never fails to respond to a lady's wishes, be they only evident or plainly expressed, with the result of entanglements not a few. He is married in his happy-go-lucky, careless way to a pathetic little French girl, merely to escape a situation which the turning of a page would have shown him did not exist; and then comes the prettiest part of the story, "Little Thing's" devotion to her inadvertent spouse; his efforts, poor and obscure as he had elected to be, to "make good" a second time as a popular writer; her thrifty and beautiful ordering of the little menage in the Latin Quarter; the joys no less than the pangs of poverty; and the brilliant and erratic circle of which the author was speedily made free. In passing there are many rapid-fire comments upon things literary and artistic; many clever inversions of accepted ethics; and all sorts of episodes, some of which are of the nature of excrescences that might well be removed to the betterment of the story. The situations are so kaleidoscopic and so sudden that there are times when the reader's panting imagination toils in vain after the too vivacious fancy of the writer. By and by, when things seem to be going upon velvet, we are led, to our dismay, into the saddest of tragedies—the pretender, with many sins upon his head, at last commits one that is unpardonable; and then—lo! presto! that lightning-change artist cuts his final antic, and, laughing in our faces, grants us the happy ending.

The author has succeeded in capturing the fascination of Paris. The charm of that atmosphere and the delicately drawn and touching figure of "Little Thing" are the highest achievements of this very clever and unusual book.

FREELANCE IN KASHMIR

A FREELANCE IN KASHMIR. By Lieut. Colonel G. F. MacMunn. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.50.

Far from the beaten track of novels runs this story, a historical romance having a scene and a flavor quite its own. Its scene is mainly among the mountains and vales of Kashmir, its time a century ago, and its people and its incidents sufficiently based upon historical events to add to their seeming of reality. It deals with happenings in Hindustan and Kashmir in the years of the conquering of India by the English, and among its characters are some of the important men and women, native, English, and halfbreed, who had a share in those events. The author has evidently spent much time in that region, studied its lore with deep interest, known its people, and felt to the full the fascination of its half-understood mysteries. His hero is a young halfbreed, the son of an English officer and an Afghan Princess, who with a handful of followers sets out to find an employer for his sword. Service with the Begum Somru takes him to Kashmir and gives him many and surprising adventures. A curious cosmopolitan medley of characters crowds the pages—an Indian swami, a Jesuit priest, Rajput natives, Afghan Princesses, a Persian courtesan, a Turkish noble, an English officer, a mysterious Afghan having profound knowledge of Masonic lore. The story moves very slowly and with much description that evidently is born out of intimate knowledge of the country and the people, but if one wants a novel that is markedly different from most brands of fiction and possessed of the richest and most distinctive sort of local flavor this historical romance will give him piquant entertainment.

MARRIAGE BY CONQUEST

MARRIAGE BY CONQUEST. By Warwick Deeping. McBride, Nast & Co. $1.25 net.

Just so surely as Maggie Tulliver found that in novels "the blond-haired women carry away all the happiness," have we found that the swashbuckler hero invariably wins over the man of books. Mr. Deeping reverses this hoary custom, nor does he hold to the notion which has cropped up in fiction now and again since the days of the cave-man, that the argument of the club is the most efficacious in wooing, as in war. His Sussex Squire, with his "iron wrist and mesmerizing eye," is but a brute and a bully; while the scholarly lover, although on as free and easy terms with classic tongues as old Sam Johnson himself, and so far in advance of his time that he refuses the arbitrament of the duel, is, nevertheless, no anaemic bookworm, but a man, every inch of him, full of good red blood. The heroine is remarkably fine, a woman of spirit and fire, as fearless as she is charming. The humble pair are no less well drawn; and the author shows an independence in love-making as well as in lovers, by utterly refusing to take advantage of various openings for misunderstandings and subtle self-tormentings on the part of both gentle and simple, and permitting no cloud to mar their trust in each other. He carries his sturdy commonsense even into the "taking-off" of a parlous villain, making shrewd "Miss Quickly" exclaim: "Let them bury the scoundrel, and forget all about it. Bless me, there is too much fuss made at times about a clean and sensible murder."

It is impossible, having once begun "Marriage by Conquest," to lay it aside until the last sentence has been read. Only after we have come from under the spell of the dramatic plot do we appreciate that in both conception and execution it is a book of very unusual merit and originality—a most refreshing departure from old conventions and modern morbidness.

NEWS OF BOOKS

Fiction for May and Other Timely Publications

At the end of this week Doubleday, Page & Co. will have ready "The Man Who Rocked the Earth," by Arthur Train and Robert Williams Wood, a tale of many marvels induced by scientific agencies and their effect upon the human race. Mr. Wood, the co-author, is Professor of Experimental Physics at Johns Hopkins and is the author, in addition to works dealing with his scientific specialty, of two little books of humorous verses and illustrations, "How to Tell the Birds from the Flowers" and "Animal Analogues."

The Century Company promises for May publication "Diantha," by Juliet Wilbor Tompkins, the story of a modern Cinderella who, because she is not handsome, lacks the good times which her beautiful twin sister enjoys. A mystery story called "The Brockle-bank Riddle," by Hubert Wales, will also be brought out soon by this house. The "riddle" of the story is concerned with the reappearance in his London office of a man who had died during the ascent of Mont Blanc and whose body had been cremated.

"The Primrose Ring," by Ruth Sawyer, described as a grown-up fairy tale, is ready for immediate publication by the Harpers.

A collection of short stories by Helen Mackay, whose "Houses of Glass" attracted attention, is listed for May publication by Duffield & Co. It is called "Accidentals" and its tales are said to be very unconventional. Some of them deal with situations since the war began in France, which has been Mrs. Mackay's home for years.

The Appletons will publish tomorrow "The Forest of Swords," Joseph A. Altsheler's new volume in his series of novels for young people dealing with the European war.

"America Fallen: The Sequel to the European War," is the title of a novel by J. Bernard Walker which Dodd, Mead & Co. have ready for immediate issue. It describes the capture of America by a foreign power and the forcing of this country to foot the bill for the European struggle.

Mitchell Kennerley has ready for publication at once "One Man," by Robert Steele, which tells in autobiographical style the story of the life of an ordinary American to his middle age. Mr. Kennerley will also publish, within a week or two, "Mountain Blood," by Joseph Hergesheimer. Its scene is in the mountain region of Virginia, and it tells the story of the life and death of a mountain stage driver.

Within a week or two Mitchell Kennerley will have ready Frank H. Simonds's "The Great War: The Second Phase," taking up the story of the European struggle where it was left by Mr. Simonds at the close of his first volume, which attracted much attention last Fall. It ended with the fall of Antwerp, and the new book will carry his review and discussion of developments up to about the first of April.

D. Appleton & Co. will publish this week "Dye Stuffs and Coal Tar Products," by Thomas Beacall, a volume which will have much interest for all who are concerned over the difficulty, since the war began, of getting dye materials from Germany. It is a practical book, dealing with the nature and manufacture of dyes, inks, and synthetic products.

Walter Tallmadge Arndt, Executive Secretary of the Municipal Government Association of New York State, is the author of "The Emancipation of the American City," which Duffield & Co. have in train for early publication. It is a study of the principles underlying home rule in cities and of the agencies a city should possess in order to give the best possible service to its citizens.

On May 12 the Macmillan Company will publish "The Wealth and Income of the People of the United States," by Williford I. King of the Faculty of the University of Wisconsin, which deals in an untechnical way, but largely by means of statistics, with such questions as the increase of riches and of poverty, the distribution of wealth and income, and economic and social tendencies. The work is a new volume in the Macmillan Citizen's Library Series.

Although James T. Young's "The New American Government," which this house will bring out at the same time, is intended primarily for college students, the author has prepared it for the use also of general readers who are interested in the activities of government. It deals with present problems, applies the test of results, and depicts the government as it is at the present time. The author is Professor of Public Administration in the University of Pennsylvania.

The John C. Winston Company lists for publication this month "Ireland: Vital Hour," by Arthur Lynch, M. P., a discussion and criticism of the present state of Irish affairs said to be of a conciliatory and unifying nature. The author points out what he conceives to be the true way for Ireland to attain concord with England.

"Streetland," by Philip Davis, will be the next title in Small, Maynard & Co.'s Welfare Library Series. It will be ready soon and will discuss the problem of city children and their play in the streets.

Dodd, Mead & Co. have published "Rabindranath Tagore," by Basanta Koomar Roy, an authentic biography of the Hindu poet by a native Hindu who is his personal friend. Information about India makes a background for the life of the poet and an estimate of his work.

The Scribners will publish in the latter part of this month "John Huss: His Life, Teachings, and Death After Five Hundred Years," by David S. Schaff.

James Barnes's account of his trip "Through Central Africa, from Coast to Coast," will be published tomorrow by the Appletons. The journey, which was made two years ago, was westward from British East Africa through Abyssinia and Uganda and then down to the Congo, following Stanley's trail on the Emin Pasha relief expedition. The author was accompanied by Cherry Kearton, the famous photographer of wild animal life, who has furnished more than a hundred illustrations. The expedition was governed by the principle that there should be no slaughter of animal life that was not absolutely necessary.

The traveler who stays on this continent this Summer and goes northward will find a useful handbook in Ruth Kedzie Wood's "The Tourist's Maritime Provinces," which describes picturesque and little-known sections in Halifax, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia.

ROBERT J. BURDETTE

New York Times Review of Books:

WITHIN a week I asked at one of the leading libraries of New York for a certain book written by Robert J. Burdette, and after some index consultation it was reported that the book was not in the library, nor was there any book in the library written by that author. Yet Robert J. Burdette was one of the master humorists of American literature, a writer of humor that not only lay along the lines of smiles, but touched as it passed the lines of tears. No writer of humor has done that as Burdette did it, except it is James Whitcomb Riley in his plain verse—not in his poetry—but Burdette was not only a master of prose, but of verse as well. For a number of years he lived in California, where he died last year, and now his latest and last book, "The Drums of the 47th," has been issued by the Bobbs-Merrill Company, copyrighted by his widow, Clara B. Burdette, who says in the foreword:

> Historians prepare themselves for their tasks by much reading and by the study of great events. * * * The author of this volume acquired his preparation when he himself was a maker of history. The facts told here are not compiled from other men's records, but are released from an unfading mental gallery of pictures made at a time when young life was most impressionable and the flashlights of events most unerring.

At 18 "Bob" Burdette, as he was always known, enlisted in the Forty-seventh Illinois Infantry in 1862, and fought through the civil war, taking part in over twenty battles and innumerable skirmishes, and it is out of these experiences he writes this book. There is in it the pathos and the humor of every soldier's life, the tragedy and the comedy, and it is human always and living with the truth that can be written only out of experience. It is in no sense a "funny" book, but the humor is so mixed with the pathos that the reader's tears are chased away by the smiles that must come. Never anywhere in its pages does the boy forget the mother at home anxiously waiting for him, and his tribute to the mothers of soldiers is something to be written imperishably.

At this time the book is of unusual interest, and, with so many writers writing of the present war, it is well for readers to compare not only the events of war, but the manner of telling of them.

Now that Burdette has gone, his works should live after him, and there should be a collection of his writings in prose and verse published as a permanent contribution to the literature of the time, that those who have not known him should know him and those who followed him should have a material foundation for their admiration and their love, for no author was ever more loved by his readers than was Bob Burdette.

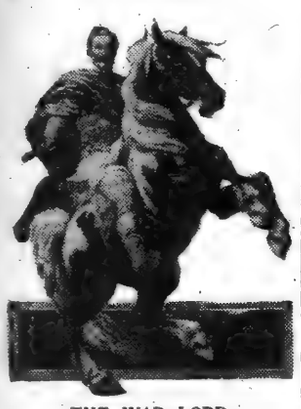
THE PSYCHOLOGY OF THE KAISER, BY DR. MORTON PRINCE

A Careful Study of His Sentiments and His Obsession Made by One of the Foremost Medical Psychologists in the World, Who Bases His Interesting Series of Deductions on the Acts and Recorded Utterances of the German Emperor.



THE WAR LORD.
A Painting Made Under Instructions by the Kaiser.

I.
THE KAISER'S ANTIPATHY

IN the psychology of the Kaiser there is nothing that is more dominant than his increasing and virulent antipathy to a great body of citizens constituting no less than one-third of his empire—the Social Democrats.

We have all read of the Kaiser's hatred of the party known as the Social Democratic Party. We have read the epithets which he has constantly hurled at them, and of his antipathy to their creeds. "Traitors," "a plague that must be exterminated," "a horde of men unworthy to bear the name of Germans," "foes to the country and empire," "people without a country and enemies of religion," he has called them.

To a delegation of striking miners he said:

> For me every Social Democrat is synonymous with an enemy of the empire and of his country. If, therefore, I believe that there are any Socialist tendencies in the movement, (the strike of 100,000 men,) stirring up to unlawful resistance, I shall act with merciless rigor and bring to bear all the power at my disposal—which is great.

Again:

> The doctrines of the Social Democrats are not only opposed to the commandments of God and Christian morality but are also altogether unpractical, being equally injurious to the individuals and the whole community.

So violent is the hatred of the Kaiser toward this party that he even has thought it might come to suppressing it by the army. He said to the young soldiers at Potsdam:

> For you there is only one foe, and that is my foe. In view of our present Socialist troubles, it may come to this, that I command you to shoot down your own relatives, brothers, and even parents, in the streets, which God forbid; but then you must obey my orders without a murmur.

Why so much feeling? Why such recurrent outbursts of anger and hatred against a political party which in numbers is twice as large as any other single party in the empire, a party which in 1912 cast 4,250,000 votes and which was represented in the German Parliament in 1912 by 110 members, the representatives of over 21,000,000 people, nearly one-third of the population?

These are strong words of the Kaiser's I have quoted. They are not mere invectives uttered during the heat of a political campaign. They are not to be classed with those emotional castigations with which political stump-speech orators, working themselves up to a state of passionate indignation, flay their adversaries, and which are promptly forgotten as soon as the campaign is ended—albeit the Kaiser is essentially a stump-speech orator.

We have all learned not to take seriously the ephemeral indignation of the political orator. But the Kaiser's denunciation of the Social Democrats is the expression of an antipathy which is fixed, deep-rooted, persistent, and is a part of his personality, for it has manifested itself in the form of recurrent attacks of anger and hatred ever since he came to the throne, twenty-seven years ago. It is like unto an obsessing idea, common enough, which, fixed deep down in the mind, rises in consciousness whenever its object presents itself.

Fixed antipathies are always, for the psychologist, objects of interesting study, but for others, even in an Emperor, they are little more than matters of intellectual curiosity unless the antipathy is one of practical political import, one that affects the policies of Government and the course of history.

If the antipathy of the Kaiser were only of that trivial kind common to many people, which is manifested as a dread of snakes, or of death, or other banal object, its study would be of little practical interest excepting for its victim, William II. himself, although the revelation of its origin and meaning would give an insight into one component, however unimportant, of an exalted personality.

The periodical recurrence of the antipathy and the psychological reactions to which it gave rise would probably affect the happiness of no one but himself and the unhappy members of his family who would have to bear the brunt of it. No one is interested in other people's symptoms.

But it is different when such a recurring antipathy is of a political nature. Then by a study of the underlying causes of this oosessing idea we not only can obtain an insight into important components of the psychology of a great historical character, but we should expect to find the true motives which have determined those policies of Government, and the course of history, which have been the direct result of the antipathy.

The Kaiser's hatred of the Social Democrats has had momentous practical consequences. It is safe to say that it has been more than any other single factor the motive which has determined him to maintain, against the progressive spirit of modern civilisation, the present autocratic system of government, to resist all liberal attempts to change the Constitution so as to give responsible representative government to the people and to defend what he claims as his prerogatives. It has determined other tyrannous measures which have suppressed freedom of speech and the press and banefully oppressed the liberty of the German people. I refer to the law of lèse-majesté.

This law, a return to the feudalism of the middle ages, is the means the Kaiser employs to punish those who talk back. He may insult his subjects, call them all manner of names, misrepresent their principles, their purposes and ideals, excite animosity against them "as enemies to the country and religion," but if they answer back they are met by the law of lèse-majesté, and this law is enforced, as every one knows, with merciless severity to suppress political opponents.

Against the Democrats the law has been used as a weapon of suppression, though without success. Under this law statistics showed that up to 1898, during only the first decade of William II.'s reign, more than 1,000 years of imprisonment had been inflicted upon offenders. A recent responsible writer asserts that up to 1914 the sentences had reached 30,000 years, but I do not know upon what authority these figures are based.

It is not surprising that editors of Social Democratic newspapers, many political leaders of the party, and writers for the Democratic press have been among those who have served terms in prison for lèse-majesté, or offense against the press law.

There have been times when scarcely a week passed without three or four trials. But against the Social Democratic members of the Reichstag when making use of their prerogatives as elected representatives of the people, this law has not been sufficient to satisfy the Kaiser's animosity. So on one occasion when they refused to rise and cheer him, in response to a demand, the Kaiser had introduced, through his Chancellor, a bill to permit the criminal prosecution of these delegates. To its credit, be it said, the majority refused to permit this encroachment upon its rights.

It is safe to say that such a criminal law and its abuse for political purposes in England would cost the King his crown.

To this antipathy of the Kaiser may also be traced in large part responsibility for the consolidation of the autocratic and military party in Germany. For, by suppressing the political power of the only militant party that has opposed this autocracy, the Kaiser has been enabled to solidify his power and intrench himself with his army as the dominating political force which has determined the foreign policies of the empire.

It is safe to say that if the democracy had been in power, or if the constitutional system of government had been such that the Social Democratic Party, in and out of the Reichstag, could have made its influence felt, the foreign and military policies and methods of the Government would have been far different and there would have been no war. Germanism and Pan-Germanism would not have threatened the world.

More than this, it is impossible, I believe, for any one to study the internal politics of Germany without arriving at the firm conviction that the elimination of German militarism, for which the war is being waged, and therefore the hope of permanent world's peace, must rest upon the German democratic party. From this viewpoint, the study of the Kaiser's antipathy for the Social Democratic Party offers a most fruitful psychological study.

Why, then, I repeat, so much feeling when the Kaiser thinks of the Social Democratic Party? Why such hatred of it? Why such anger? Why such a personal attitude?

To explain it on the ground of differences in political principles, as a political antipathy intensely expressed in terms of an intense emotional personality, is a superficial and inadequate psychological explanation, although it is commonly satisfying as a political explanation. The two are not synonymous. The reasons for this distinction will appear as we proceed.

If the party represented only a small band of criminal agitators, of militant anarchists, let us say, who sought by assassination and terrorism to destroy the existing Government, such an attitude of mind would be easily comprehensible and would need no analysis. But the Social Democratic Party in 1888, on the accession of William II., on the basis of one voter in every five of the population, represented less than 4,000,000 subjects, and in 1912 over 21,000,000, a third of the total population. It is, therefore, representative of a large part of the public opinion of the empire, and, above all, of the working classes. Indeed, it is the largest political party in the empire. Criminal agitation is, therefore, out of the question.

In other countries political feeling in times of crises often runs high, and at times statesmen, rulers, leaders of political parties generally have strong political bias and feel intensely hostile to their political opponents; but they do not regard them as foes of their country, and God, and religion, to be crushed by every force in the power of the Government; and they rarely carry their hostility, and anger, and hatred into social and industrial life, as has been the case with the German Emperor.

Furthermore, the persistency of the Emperor's antipathy is remarkable. It is like an obsession. He has retained, undiminished, his hatred of the Social Democrats from his accession to the outbreak of the war, and has never ceased to angrily stigmatize them with such emotional epithets as I have cited.

Now it is probable, owing to a psychological law, that when strong emotion, out of all apparent proportion to the cause, is excited by some object, that object has struck some sentiment, a "complex" of ideas and emotions deeply rooted in the personality, but not squarely admitted and faced by consciousness. Examples of this we see every day.

A strong protectionist inveighs with intense anger against the principle of free trade and the political party that advocates this principle in its platform. The reason he consciously gives is the economic disadvantage which, he apprehends, will result to the country at large. But though this may be a reason, or rather one reason for his political opinion, it is not the real reason for his emotion—his anger and his invectives.

These are due to the fact that the free-trade doctrine strikes a chord within him which resonates with selfish fear for his own business interests, and the reaction of this chord is anger. In other words, to use a homely phrase, while apparently speaking from the viewpoint of political principles, he is really "talking out of his pocket." But he does not squarely face and perhaps is only half conscious or entirely unconscious of this fact. This selfish viewpoint is his "unconscious attitude of mind."

Now, is the Kaiser's antipathy to the Social Democrats merely the expression of an academic disbelief in Marxian principles of socialism and a disbelief in the practicability of such principles if applied by the State to political government? Or are these only ostensible reasons for his antipathy? If the latter, a study of the Kaiser's mind ought to reveal deep-rooted sentiments of another kind which will explain his emotional reaction. But in that case, for a complete explanation, we must inquire what there is that is peculiar in the political tenets of the Social Democracy that touches these sentiments and excites the reaction. In other words, it is a question of the Why.

These questions rise above a banal curiosity to inquire into a peculiar personal dislike of an Emperor, however that might be justified by the exalted world-position which he occupies. They are important in that, if pursued, they may lead to a deeper understanding of his personality, and they may unfold both his viewpoint of government as exemplified by the German system and the antagonistic viewpoint of the German Democracy, which for many years has been striving against the power of the Emperor to force its ideals and aspirations upon the autocracy that rules Germany.

All these questions are involved in the psychology of the personality of the Kaiser. The political questions are involved, for no personality can be understood apart from its environment to which it reacts, and which is largely responsible for the formation of "sentiments."

The sentiments are of prime and fundamental importance in the formation of a personality. I use the term "sentiments" in a psychological sense and not in accordance with popular restricted usage. I shall have occasion later to explain how sentiments are formed after we have become acquainted with some of the Kaiser's mental attitudes.

Meanwhile I would simply explain in justification of this inquiry, that character depends upon the psycho-physiological organization of ideas, derived in the broadest sense from life's experiences, with the innate primitive instinctive dispositions to behave or react to given situations, (i. e., to react to the environment.)

Thus, on the one hand, sentiments are formed which characterize our attitude toward life, including therein our personal, social, political, and industrial relations to the world about us, and on the other the inborn natural instincts of man are harnessed, controlled, and repressed or cultivated and given free rein. Upon the development of sentiments, therefore, not only the behavior of the individual depends, but the whole social organization. Of course, in a brief article of this kind we shall be obliged to limit ourselves to a few of the sentiments involved in the questions placed before us and therefore to a very limited study of the Kaiser's personality.

II.
THE KAISER'S PREROGATIVES.

LET us go back to the year 1888, when the Kaiser came to the throne. In his very first speech to the Prussian Diet he proclaimed with noticeable emphasis that he was "firmly resolved to maintain intact and guard from all encroachment the chartered prerogatives of the Crown." ("The Kaiser," edited by Asa Don Dickenson, page 113.) It was noticed that he laid marked stress on these words, so that it was publicly commented upon by those who heard him. This intention to defend his prerogatives the Kaiser has consistently maintained ever since, and more than once has proclaimed. What are the "prerogatives" about which the Kaiser took the very first opportunity to warn Germany and about which he has been so tenacious? They can be briefly stated.

In the first place, we must know it is the Kaiser's prerogative not to be responsible to the people or to Parliament, but only to himself. He does not derive his power from either, but he reigns by his own right. This is his prerogative. Furthermore, he not only reigns, but it is his prerogative to govern. The King of England reigns, but, as has so often been said, he does not govern. In England the responsibility for governing rests entirely with the Ministry, which in principle is only a select committee of Parliament. It is the English Parliament, therefore, and practically the elected House of Commons that governs.

In the second place it is the Kaiser's prerogative to appoint a Chancellor to help him govern. He has no Cabinet, nor Board of Advisors. The Chancellor is responsible only to the Emperor. Parliament may be entirely opposed to him, but in such case he does not necessarily resign, as would the British Prime Minister, nor is it the customary usage. He may not have been a member of Parliament when appointed. The Kaiser alone may dismiss him, as he dismissed Bismarck. The Emperor may disregard him and his advice, if he likes; so that in practice he may be his own Chancellor, as it is commonly said in Germany he has been ever since Bismarck's dismissal and as Bismarck foretold would be the case.

A third prerogatives is to appoint the Ministers, the heads of the great departments—Navy, Foreign Affairs, Colonies, &c., who are under the Chancellor. Thus all executive power resides in the Kaiser. Parliament has none. We may say it is the Kaiser's prerogative to be the administration.

A fourth prerogative is to be Commander in Chief of the Army and to have absolute authority over the forces of the army both in peace and in war. (Art. 63 of the Constitution.) It is his prerogative to "determine the numerical strength, the organization, and the divisional contingents of the imperial army"; also to appoint all superior officers. (Art. 64.) That the Kaiser regards this as one of his most cherished prerogatives the world well knows.

A fifth and exceedingly powerful prerogative is to appoint and control the seventeen members of the upper house—the Bundesrat, or Federal Council—the most powerful upper house in the world. The Kaiser thus has the votes—only fourteen being required—to defeat any amendment to the Constitution, and in practice he has always controlled a majority of the Council, which has been the creature of the Kaiser throughout its history. With the consent of the Council he can declare war, but, as the Council is a lady of easy consent, this limitation need not bear hardly and the wooing need be but short and light.

A sixth prerogative is to initiate all legislation, although indirectly, through his controlled Federal Council, of which the Chancellor is President. The lower house, the Reichstag, elected by the people, cannot initiate legislation, so well did Bismarck fix the Constitution for the benefit of Prussia and the Kaiser.

All measures must originate in the upper house, which can also veto them when amended in the Reichstag, and can dissolve the latter (with the Kaiser's consent) if it doesn't like its ways. (Think of the House of Lords dissolving the Commons!) The Kaiser has thus very great power in controlling legislation. (With almost innumerable parties, none of which has a majority, in the House, log-rolling under an astute Chancellor has been raised to a fine art, which would make an American State Legislature blush like a neophyte.)

The Reichstag, however, can refuse to vote supplies and to pass measures favored by the Kaiser. The elected representatives of the people can thus talk, resolve and criticise, and refuse to follow the Kaiser and thus create a public opinion which he may or may not dare to oppose, but they can do little more.

III.
THE KAISER'S DIVINE RIGHT DELUSION.

FINALLY; the Kaiser claims that his prerogative to govern is derived from God, granted by the Almighty to his house, the house of Hohenzollern. This is far from being meant as a figure of speech or mere rhetoric, or an allegorical expression of religious responsibility for duties to be performed. It is a deep, all-abiding belief and principle of action.

It is difficult for us Americans of the twentieth century fully to grasp this belief in a present-day man of boasted culture, from whom we expect common sense. We may laugh at it, but in its practical consequences it is no laughing matter. It is fundamental to the Kaiser's viewpoint and to an understanding of his attitude toward his subjects and the world. Another sovereign derives his right to reign, if not to govern, from the Constitution of his country, which means in the last analysis by contract with his people.

But the German Emperor refuses to acknowledge any responsibility to the people, or any dependence upon the people or the Constitution or contract, for his right to govern. He derives this right directly from God. Whatever rights and powers the people possess descend from the Kaiser, who grants them through the Constitution; the rights and powers of the Kaiser do not ascend from the people, as in a democracy.

The concentration of irresponsible hereditary power in one man and those appointed by him is plainly an autocracy. "The Divine right of Kings to rule" is a doctrine dating back to the Middle Ages, and is by Americans naively supposed to have ended with the dissolution of the "Holy Alliance," whose designs upon South America gave rise to our Monroe Doctrine in 1823.

This doctrine of Divine right, then, is one of the prerogatives, if not in his mind the great prerogative, which the Kaiser announced he was resolved to defend. And it does not belong to the present Kaiser alone, but was possessed, as he claims, by his long line of ancestors of the House of Hohenzollern, and will descend to his successors of this house. It is the prerogative of his house. He announced:

> It is the tradition of our house that we, the Hohenzollerns, regard ourselves as appointed by God to govern and to lead the people whom it is given us to rule, for their well-being and the advancement of their material and intellectual interests.

And again:

> I look upon the people and nation handed on to me as a responsibility conferred upon me by God; and that it is, as is written in the Bible, my duty to increase this heritage, for which one day I shall be called upon to give an account; those who try to interfere with my task I shall crush.

And again:

> I regard my whole position as given to me direct from heaven, and that I have been called by the Highest to do His work, by One to Whom I must one day render an account.

This claim as German Emperor, or as King of Prussia, has been announced again and again by the Kaiser, and his words have been quoted by the press, by magazine writers and pamphleteers and bookmakers unto weariness of the reader.

The prerogatives we have briefly summarized are imperial, but be it noted they are double-headed in that—mutatis mutandis—they also belong to William II. as King of Prussia so far as the constitutional relations of the kingdom to the empire make them applicable.

The odd notion of Divine right the Kaiser picked up from his grandfather, William I., who, when he was crowned King of Prussia at Königsberg, to show he was above the Constitution which his predecessor had granted the people, raised with his own hands the crown from the altar, "set it on his own head, and announced in a loud voice, 'I receive this crown from God's hand and from none other.'"

And, referring to this historical incident, the present Kaiser, William II., in a speech, now historic, at the same place, said:

> And here my grandfather, again, by his own right, set the Prussian crown upon his head, once more distinctly emphasizing the fact that it was accorded him by the will of God alone, and not by Parliament or by any assemblage of the people or by popular vote, and that he thus looked upon himself as the chosen instrument of Heaven, and as such performed his duties as regent and sovereign.

From a psychological point of view, it does not matter—any more than it signified anything to the Kaiser and his grandfather—that, as a matter of fact, the first ruling Hohenzollern of Brandenburg, Elector Frederick I., acquired his title to the Electorate by taking and foreclosing a mortgage on the province, and a rather poor title at that, as there was already a mortgage on the property which it was convenient to repudiate. Perhaps royal second mortgages—like marriages—are made in Heaven, and thus they become "Divine rights."

What does psychologically matter is that the present Kaiser has persuaded himself, forgetting all about this business transaction, that his early Hohenzollern Shylock (in foreclosing the mortgage) "felt within himself the call to journey to this land" of Brandenburg—plainly a Divine call—and "was convinced that the task [of governing] was given him from above." (Kaiser's speech, Feb. 3, 1899.)

What counts psychologically is that the Kaiser believes that a Divine right to rule is his prerogative. How, in this age, a man who has shown such marked ability in certain directions can be such a fool—I mean psychologically, of course—as to persuade himself to believe such stuff, is another story that would make an interesting psychological study in itself, and in the last analysis could probably be traced to sub-conscious wishes or dreads which have produced this conscious delusion, just as such subconscious processes determine the delusions of insane people.

Our conscious thoughts are much more determined by subconscious processes, of which we are unaware, than we realize.

One great popular delusion is that our minds are more exact logical instruments than they really are, and we stand in awe of the minds of great men, thinking that because they are superior in certain directions, therefore they are superior in all other directions of their activities where they claim superiority; whereas, as a matter of fact, a man may be eminently superior in certain fields of mental activity and psychologically a perfect fool-thinker and fool-performer in other fields.

Helmholtz said of the eye that it was such an imperfect optical instrument that if an instrument maker should send him an optical instrument so badly made he would refuse to accept it and return it forthwith. He might have said the same thing of the human mind. It is a very imperfect instrument of thought. All we can say of it is, that though a poor thing, it is the best we can get. The deeper insight we get into the mechanism of the human mind, the poorer thing it appears as an instrument of precision.

The most curious part of this whole divine right business is that in Germany, with all its "Kultur," there has been scarcely one single voice among all the people of Germany publicly to deny this claim, excepting the voice of the Social Democracy; or if there has, it has been like a voice crying in the wilderness—or perhaps from behind prison bars, where such rashness brought the prisoner, condemned under the feudal law of lèse-majesté. We shall presently see what the German democracy thinks about it.

IV.
THE GERMAN AUTOCRACY AND THE ARMY.

THE practical upshot of this whole German system of government, in which imperial prerogatives and an impotent opera bouffe Reichstag are essential ingredients, is that the Kaiser with his Chancellor and the Ministers of the several departments, (Foreign Affairs, Navy, Post Office, &c.,) a beaurocracy responsible only to the Kaiser, constitute an autocracy independent of Parliament and the voters. Consequently the Government is intended to be and is for the State, by the State, not of the people, by the people.

The Kaiser's point of view of his own place in the State is shown by some of his sayings: "There is only one master in this country—I am he and I will not tolerate another." "There is no law but my law; there is no will but my will," he told his soldiers, and, "The King's will is the highest law" he wrote in the Golden Book of Munich.

And so, as a German Professor, Ludwig Gurlitt, has said:

> He regards his people, the masses, as children not yet of age, and thinks the Government competent to prescribe the course of their social and cultural development—a profound and fatal mistake * * * a mediaeval idea!

Autocracy makes for efficiency, but it also makes for the suppression of the aspirations of the people and self-government. But if the Kaiser, the bureaucracy, and an associated [illegible] maintained the traditions of a Divine right to rule.

V.
THE KAISER'S SENTIMENTS.

WITH the meaning of all these prerogatives in mind, let us look a bit more closely into the psychology of the Kaiser. In doing so let us bear in mind that in the doctrine of Divine right we see developed in the Kaiser a strong sentiment of the most personal kind, of birthright, of self-interest. And, besides this, in all the other prerogatives which the Kaiser has so defiantly resolved to defend against all encroachments, we also have sentiments of self-interest—sentiments of possession, of rights pertaining to self.

All these sentiments are bound up with a consciousness of his own personality (a "self-regarding" sentiment) with his ego. And there is a great deal of ego, of consciousness of his ego, in his personality. Perhaps his enemies would say, as was said of the great orang-utan, Bimi, in Kipling's tale—Bimi, who also wished to crush his enemies in furious outbursts of jealous rage—"there is too much ego in his cosmos."

Now, as a matter of psychology, "sentiments" are of tremendous importance as factors in personality and as forces which determine attitudes of mind, reactions of the personality to the environment and conduct.

Upon the formation of "sentiments" the character of a person and his social behavior fundamentally depend. And by the formation of sentiments in the course of the individual's mental development the primitive innate instincts of human nature are harnessed and brought under control and their impulses given proper direction. Thus their primitive impulses are repressed or cultivated according to the ideals of society. Otherwise, driven by the impulses of our innate instincts, we should all run amuck through society.

We must understand, then, a little more precisely what, psychologically and technically speaking, a sentiment is. I am not using the word in the popular sense. Without going into the psychology deeply, we may say that a sentiment is an idea of something, as its object, organized or associated with one or more instinctive emotions which give the idea impulsive force.

In the personality of every human being, and the same is true of animals, there are a number of emotional instincts. These instincts are characterized by a particular emotion which each possesses, and may be named indifferently, for our present purposes, either after the emotion itself or after the biological aim which the instinct serves.

Every person, for instance, possesses a pugnacity instinct of which the emotion is anger. Other such instincts are fear, parental feeling, disgust, curiosity, self-assertion, self-abasement, reproduction, and so on. All such instincts have a biological function in that they serve either to protect, like anger and fear, the individual (and the species) from danger against its enemies and prevent its extinction, or, like the parental and reproductive instincts, serve to perpetuate the species, or like the curiosity instinct, to acquire knowledge and learn by experience, and so on. Emotion, as the very word itself indicates, moves us—i. e., it is a force that impels toward some end and the emotion of each instinct carries it to fulfillment.

PSYCHOLOGY OF THE KAISER

When an emotion—i. e., instinct—has been excited by some object, whether it be a material thing, like a snake, or another person, or something mental—an idea of a material object or a thought as of a possible danger to the individual, or of a political principle—the emotion may become so associated with and bound to the object that whenever the object is presented in consciousness the emotion is excited. This particularly happens when the emotion has been frequently excited by the same object.

Thus a person may acquire a fear of snakes, or thunderstorms or hatred of a person. Two or more emotional instincts may be thus associated with a given idea as their object.

Now, when an idea always excites one or more emotions, so that the idea is always accompanied by the same emotional reaction, the whole is called a sentiment. Thus we have the sentiment of love of a mother for her child, of hatred of a tyrant, of disgust for a vicious person, of pride of self, and so on.

Practically, psychological analysis shows that the organization of a sentiment is more complicated than such a simple association would make it, and that the sentiment is deeply and widely rooted in a number of ramifying, previous mental experiences of an emotional kind. This is expressed by popular language when we say a given sentiment is deeply rooted in a person's personality. The mechanism, as I have stated it, however, is sufficiently accurate for our purpose. The emotions serve to give their ideas great intensity and driving force for action.

With these general principles in mind, one has only to read the Kaiser's speeches to recognize that his ideas of himself and of his prerogatives, which he jealously defends, are organized with instinctive emotions of great intensity—emotions belonging to greed of possession, and pride, and self-assertion, (or self-display,) and pugnacity, and vengeful emotion, and jealousy. These ideas are therefore sentiments deeply fixed and organized in his personality, and given great driving force by their emotions, which tend to carry them to activity and fruition.

Hence it is that the Kaiser's sentiments of himself and his prerogatives exhibit great intensity of feeling and determine his conduct to assert his rights and to exercise and enjoy them by being his own Chancellor and ruling the army and empire, and, if need be, to defend them most vigorously.

VI.

THE KAISER'S SELF-REGARDING SENTIMENT.

BUT we must leave these traits of the Kaiser's personality for the immediate issue of our study. One sentiment, however, ought to be considered more intimately if certain of his most notorious peculiarities are to be understood. I refer to what has been called the "self-regarding" sentiment.

Every person possesses such a sentiment, although it varies according to the ingredients that enter into it. Professor William McDougall, one of the most eminent of contemporary psychologists, has analyzed this sentiment, and attributes it to the biological instincts of self-assertion and self-abasement compounded in varying proportions with the idea of self. (These instincts are common to animals as well as men and have a biological end.) We thus get different types.

When the first instinct of self-assertion—also called self-display—with its emotion of positive self-feeling is the chief instinct, then we have a type in which pride is the main characteristic of the idea of self. When the second instinct (with the emotion of negative self-feeling) is happily blended in the sentiment, we have a type of self-respect.

To illustrate the former type, Professor McDougall (Social Psychology) draws the character of an imaginary Prince in whom the first instinct is the dominating one. It is interesting to see how perfectly his picture represents the Kaiser:

> Imagine the son of a powerful and foolish Prince to be endowed with great capacities and to have in great strength the instinct of self-display with its emotion of positive self-feeling. Suppose that he is never checked, or corrected, or criticised, but is allowed to lord it over all his fellow-creatures without restraint. The self-regarding sentiment of such a child would almost necessarily take the form of an unshakable pride, a pride constantly gratified by the attitudes of deference, gratitude, and admiration of his social environment; the only dispositions that would become organized in this sentiment of pride would be those of positive self-feeling or elation and of anger, (for his anger would be invariably excited when any one failed to assume toward him the attitude of subjection or deference.)
> His self-consciousness might be intense and very prominent, but it would remain poor in content; for he could make little progress in self-knowledge; he would have little occasion to hear, or to be interested in, the judgments of others upon himself; and he would seldom be led to reflect upon his own character and conduct. The only influences that could moralize a man so endowed and so brought up would be either religious teaching, which might give him the sense of a power greater than himself to whom he was accountable, or a very strong natural endowment of the tender emotion and its altruistic impulse, or a conjunction of these two influences.
> A man in whom the self-regarding sentiment had assumed this form would be incapable of being humbled—his pride could only be mortified; that is to say, any display of his own shortcomings or any demonstration of the superiority of another to himself could cause a painful check to his positive self-feeling and a consequent anger; but could give rise neither to shame nor to humiliation, nor to any affective state, such as admiration, gratitude, or reverence, in which negative self-feeling plays a part. And he would be indifferent to moral praise or blame; for the disposition of negative self-feeling would have no place in his self-regarding sentiment; and negative self-feeling, which renders us observant of the attitude of others toward ourselves and receptive toward their opinions, is one of the essential conditions of the influence of praise and blame upon us.

The inordinate cultivation in the Kaiser of the self-regarding sentiment with the shallowed instinct of self-display also explains, psychologically, the manifestations of certain traits which have amazed the world. I mean his colossal vanity as manifested by his fondness for dressing himself up in all sorts of uniforms and constantly changing his costumes—on occasions as often as five or six times in a single day, and even during the course of a Court reception—his fondness for having himself photographed or painted, or his portrait made as busts, lithographs, medals, basreliefs, always posing in heroic attitudes for the purpose.

It is interesting to compare the snapshots of the Kaiser with the posed photographs, (there are thousands of photographs of him,) and not only as himself, but in the heroic character of a Roman Emperor mounted on a charger, and again in imitation of the Emperor Charlemagne.

It explains his self-assumption to be an artist—a painter, a musician, a composer, an architect, an art critic, a preacher, and Heaven knows what else. It also gives a psychological explanation of his inability to stand personal criticism, and for his vain obtuseness in not being able to understand how any one should not look upon him excepting with reverent awe.

One of his subjects had been sentenced to prison for hinting something disrespectful about his sovereign:

> William was genuinely amazed that such an unnatural crime could ever have been committed. He "read and reread the papers in the case with the closest attention"; and finally said to the waiting official: "It would seem that this man hitherto has not been a criminal—son of respectable parents, himself in a respectable walk of life, with a good education. And yet—how do you explain this—this insult to the Anointed of the Lord? Strange! Strange!"

On another occasion:

> After reading a speech of the Socialist Leader Bebel, containing some animadversion upon himself, he turned to the officer in attendance with clouded brow and flashing eye, and remarked in a voice trembling with passion: "And all this to me! To me! What is the country coming to?" (The Kaiser.)

This self-regarding sentiment is also at the bottom of that dominating trait—love of power—which has led him to aspire to world power and to believe that with his army and with a stronger navy, toward the upbuilding of which he has directed untiringly his energies, he could conquer the world. It even led him to think of fighting the United States, for when we were engaged in war with Spain he declared, as I have authority for saying, "If I had had a larger fleet I would have taken Uncle Sam by the scruff of the neck."

Such, and other manifestations of the Kaiser's self-regarding sentiment, due to the impulsive force of its highly developed instinct of self-display, (self-assertion,) would make this element of his personality an interesting psychological study by itself. I merely wish now to point out that it is the extreme type of this sentiment that is responsible for many of his extravagances of speech and action, and that it plays a part, as we shall see, in his reactions to democracy.

Now let us return to the Kaiser's hatred of democracy. This also is a sentiment organized with several emotional instincts, &c., which we need not bother about here. That he has a hatred of democracy is obvious.

But why?

To know that he has a hatred is not enough. We want it explained, to know why. It is not a sufficient explanation to say that he disbelieves in the principles of democracy. That would not be sufficient to account for the development of the sentiment of hatred and for the reaction of anger which democracy excites. What created the hatred? For so much emotion there must be a deeper-lying cause—some hidden sentiment which, we may suspect, conflicts with the sentiments of his cherished prerogatives and his self-regarding sentiment.

We want to know the Why. With this object let us consider the object of the hatred—the aims of the party of democracy, one of the great political forces in Prussia and the empire, one with which, as we have seen, the Emperor has been passionately in conflict since his accession to the throne. We cannot understand the psychological reaction of the Emperor without understanding the aims and the potential power of this political force. For this purpose I shall have to ask the reader to bear for a moment with a slight digression, keeping in mind what has been said about the Kaiser's sentiments until we return to our main theme.

VII.

AIMS OF THE GERMAN DEMOCRACY

WHAT does the Social Democratic Party stand for and in what respect are its aims antagonistic to the Emperor's prerogatives and the German system of government? The party is widely regarded in the United States, I am constrained to believe, as the party of socialism. But this idea needs considerable modification. Indeed, so much so that the party would, if its aims were understood, receive the moral support of Americans.

Socialism has an ominous sound to American ears. The word has a stigma for many and is calculated to repel. At one time in its early history Marxian Socialism, formulated by Marx himself as "the social ownership of the means of production and distribution," was the dominating aim of the German Socialist Party.

But times have changed. The aims of the party have undergone various metamorphoses as the result of conflicts of factions within, fusions and political evolution. Since the Kaiser came to the throne in 1888 a revolution has taken place in the aims, methods, tactics, and programs of the party. In accordance with this change, in 1890, the name was changed to the Social Democratic Party. Socialism has been relegated to the background and democracy has become the paramount aim and issue.

In other words, the principles of the Socialist, Marx, have given place to those of the brilliant democratic leader, Lassalle. Both men are dead, but democracy survives. As one authority (S. P. Orth) puts it, "Marx is a tradition, democracy is an issue."

Today one hears very little of Marx and a great deal of "legislation" based on democratic principles:

> The last election, [1912,] with its brilliant victory for Social Democracy, was not won on the general issues of the Erfurter program, but on the particular issue of the arrogance of the bureaucracy and ballot reform.

Marxian propagandism has been sloughed off. But even if the Democratic Party still stood for socialism as its paramount aim this fact would not necessarily make it antagonistic to the Emperor's prerogatives or the German system of government. The State might become engaged in all sorts of individual enterprises without the fundamental structure of Government becoming altered. As a matter of fact, Germany is today the most socialized nation in the world.

The State owns railroad, canal and river transportation, telegraph and telephone systems, harbors and parcel post. It conducts banks, insurance, savings banks, and pawnshops. It administers sick and accident insurance and old-age pensions. The municipalities own public utilities of all kinds, theatres, markets, and warehouses.

The State, or municipality, obviously might go further and administer iron, coal, and manufacturing enterprises; it might undertake all sorts of socialistic functions without altering one whit the prerogatives of the Crown, or of Parliament, or of the relations of the Government to the people. Governmental autocracy would still exist and very likely would administer these industrial enterprises with the same satisfying efficiency with which it administers everything else it has taken hold of.

The intense anger and hatred with which the Emperor reacts to the Social Democrats cannot, therefore, be explained by the principles of socialism per se, although he may disbelieve in extreme Marxian socialism. Even if these were still the aim of the party, there must be some other explanation that a Social Democrat should be stigmatized as an enemy of the empire, of religion and God, to be shot down by the army if his party became too strong.

Let us examine then the demands as given in the latest program (1912) of the Social Democrats and some of the legislation for which they have fought. The demands are given in fourteen articles.

Number one demands equal opportunities for all, special privileges to none—good American doctrine. Number two relates to reform of the ballot laws and has been the main immediate issue. "Universal, direct, equal, secret ballot" is demanded—also American doctrine. Owing to the present inequality of the ballot the Democrats have been badly handicapped in that they cannot elect their proportionate number of representatives.

Number three relates to the existing system of government. A true Parliamentary Government is demanded, and a Ministry like that of England responsible to Parliament, instead of the present autocratic system by which the Ministry is responsible only to the Emperor. Also, it is demanded that "the power to declare war or maintain peace" be given to the lower house, (Reichstag.) Consent of the Reichstag to all State appropriations, (as with the House of Commons and the American Congress.)

Numbers four and five relate respectively to the organization of the army and reform of administrative justice, abolishing class privilege at law, &c. Number six demands the "right to combine, meet, and organize." Number seven relates to the establishment of a National Department of Labor, factory inspection, and a legalized universal eight-hour day, &c. Number eight relates to reform of the industrial insurance laws, and lowering the age of old-age pensions from 70 to 65, &c.

Number nine: complete religious freedom. Separation of Church and State. No support of any kind for religious purposes from public funds—good American doctrine again. Number ten demands universal free schools. Number eleven relates to reform of taxation demanding abolition of indirect taxes and taxes on necessities of life and reduction of tariff on those schedules which encourage trusts.

Number twelve supports "measures that tend to develop commerce and trade." Number thirteen: "A graduated income, property and inheritance tax" in order to dampen "the ardor of the rich for constantly increasing army and navy." Number fourteen: "International improvements and colonization"; but the "cessation of foreign colonization now done for the purpose of exploiting foreign peoples for the sake of gain."

The first thing that will strike the reader is the absence of anything essentially socialistic in the principles formulated in this program. They are rather what we in this country would call "Republican," "Progressive," and "Democratic." They are not nearly as socialistic as many of the functions now undertaken by the German State. With the exception of those articles that relate exclusively to German conditions (such as numbers four and eight) and the abolition of indirect taxation, they express good American doctrine and are, for the most part, axiomatic in this country.

No American and no Englishman would see anything in them to get excited about, although he might hold a different opinion about the expediency of one or the other demand. Undoubtedly the spirit of German democracy goes further than the program, especially in particular parts of Germany; nevertheless this program formulates the demands of the national party.

Between the American Republic and German democracy there is, or should be, a bond of common sympathy, a bond of common political ideals and common purpose—the love of political and religious liberty, freedom of thought, freedom of speech, and freedom of the press without fear of imprisonment or punishment under "lese-majesté" or any power of the State; the emancipation of mankind from the tyranny of autocracy; the "right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" according to the dictates of the individual conscience; the rule of the people and not of an autocracy, the subordination of the State to the will of the people—and to this end government based not upon an army, but upon public opinion as expressed by the votes of the people.

When these ideals and purposes of the German democracy are realized in the United States, American public opinion will have the strongest ties of sympathy with the great masses of Germany, struggling for these ends against an intrenched "State."

Between German democracy and American public sentiment there can be no conflict. It is only with the autocratic classes that there can be antagonism, but the autocratic classes mean the State as an artificially created entity isolated from and distinct from the masses of the people.

Why, then, does the Emperor almost alone, of American Germans, react to them with such passion, such anger, and such dread? On psychological grounds we can anticipate that such emotion must be for personal reasons and because they strike some intense emotional sentiment.

We find the key to the puzzle when we come to examine Articles 3 and 4. Number three has been the paramount issue of the democracy—it is its foundation stone. Number two, the reform of the ballot, while the main political issue of the day, is only a means to this end.

The fundamental issue is (1) a true Parliamentary Government, with parliamentary power in conformity with modern democratic ideas, such as obtains in England; and (2) the abolition of a Chancellor and Ministry appointed by the Kaiser and responsible only to the Kaiser and the substitution of a Government responsible to Parliament. Thus the Government and the army would be responsible to the people and rest upon public opinion.

This democratic principle seems to our ideas not only harmless enough, but a matter of course and only the expression of the age we live in. But to the Kaiser it means a personal cataclysm. It means the abolition of the greatest of the Kaiser's prerogatives; it means the denial of the Divine right of Kings; it means the downfall of the House of Hohenzollern, in that it means the reduction of the prerogatives of the house to reigning without governing.

He could be no longer his own Chancellor, as he is recognized generally to be today in fact. His wings would be clipped. He would be shorn of autocratic power. He could no longer dictate policies of government. The will of the people would rule. What would be the use of a "Divine right" to sit as a social ornament upon a throne and watch the people rule?

Furthermore, his "self-regarding sentiment," characterized by the instinct of self-assertion and the emotion of pride, would receive an unbearable rebuff. He would no longer be the central figure in Europe, overlording all other rulers by his personality, his autocratic power, and his prerogatives. The conflict between the Kaiser and the democracy thus becomes a personal conflict on his part.

VIII.

THE KAISER'S OBSESSION A SUBCONSCIOUS PHOBIA.

GATHERING together the facts which we have collated, we have found in the Kaiser intensely strong sentiments of his prerogatives, an almost abnormal self-regarding sentiment, and a powerful political party acting in antagonism to those sentiments and threatening in case of success to rob him of his prerogatives.

Now, with these facts in mind, let us analyze the antecedent contents of the Kaiser's mind a little more intimately. If he has been a thinking being at all, we know, in view of the political and historical facts we have studied—any assertion to the contrary would meet with incredulous skepticism—there have been thoughts, however fleeting, of what would happen to himself and his house if the democratic reforms should prevail; thoughts of being robbed of his prerogatives, robbed of his power to rule the Kingdom of Prussia, to rule the Imperial Bundesrat by his power as King of Prussia, to rule the Reichstag through the Bundesrat; thoughts of being robbed of the prerogatives to be his own Chancellor, to appoint his own Ministry, to control the army to be independent of Parliament and public opinion and the public will—in short, to be an autocratic ruler of the Kingdom of Prussia and the German Empire by Divine right.

And there has been a full realization of the increasing power of democracy, steadily growing in numbers, and rising, swelling, year by year, like a great irresistible tidal wave, threatening sooner or later to carry all before it and overwhelm the system of autocracy. And against this growing avalanche of ballots of the democracy he sees no defense for himself save the army, and so he calls upon his soldiers to be prepared to "shoot down your own relatives, brothers, and even parents in the streets," when he shall give the word of command.

Such thoughts and such realizations of future danger could not but excite the biological defensive instinct of fear. And this instinct, being associated with its object, the idea of democracy, forms a sentiment, the fear of democracy. This sentiment is further associated with or crystallized about other egoistic sentiments of self and his house and his prerogatives. Hence it may be described as a fear of democracy because of the danger to himself and his House of Hohenzollern, a fear of being deprived by the hands of the democracy of his prerogative to be an autocrat. It is a fear of democracy, not for Germany but for himself. He fears for his own life, so to speak, for, if you rob him of his prerogatives, do you not take away that which to him is his life?

This does not mean that he is aware of this very personal egoistic or egocentric fear-sentiment. He undoubtedly would not admit it to others, nor is it likely that he could, even if he would, admit it to himself, because it has not been squarely faced, but has been thrust aside, repressed by the pride of his self-regarding sentiment and not allowed to come to the full light of consciousness. Though not recognized by himself, it is there all the same, repressed into the subconscious, or, if you prefer, in the background of the mind, (which, after all, is a part of the subconscious.)

Repressed into the subconscious, it is there necessarily intimately systematized with, and has deep roots in, the many associated antecedent thoughts that, as we have seen, gave rise to it. So long as these so-called psycho-genetic thoughts are there unmodified—conserved also, like a phonographic record, in the subconscious—he could not get rid of his fixed fear of the democracy if he would.

In this light his famous declaration of his prerogative, "I am the Supreme War Lord," receives deeper meaning when at the same time we remember he is the head of that autocracy that wields the power. We can see into the background of his mind. He sees the danger, we see the fear. We see, too, in the background of his mind a realization of a growing democracy, and we find there upon what methods he relies if the German democracy should win at the polls and change the Constitution. To oppose the will of the people he has the army. And we see into his inner consciousness when he prepared (as already quoted) the minds of his young soldiers for "the day."

IX.

THE KAISER'S ANTIPATHY A DEFENSE REACTION.

NOW let us go one step further. Although this egocentric sentiment of fear for himself and his dynasty is repressed into the subconscious, it is not for that reason inert and incapable of affecting his conscious processes. On the contrary, as we are forced to believe from the result of psychological investigations into such conditions of personality, it determines many of his conscious processes of thought, of his political principles and his activities against his most dangerous political enemy.

In the first place, it induces a defense reaction of an intensely emotional character which aims to direct his activities in a direction that will protect him against the dangers of democracy. This defense reaction is anger and the sentiment of hatred.

It should be explained that psychological analysis of the emotions goes to show that the sentiment of hatred is made up of several emotions associated with its object, of at least fear and anger and vengeful emotions, which last also includes anger besides that most conspicuous trait of the Kaiser—the self-regarding sentiment.

The way the defense reaction comes into play is this: The instinctive emotions and their sentiments are awakened and recur from time to time whenever the subconscious egoistic sentiment or any of its associated psychogenetic thoughts—those of his possible fall from power—is touched. The sentiments of fear he will not admit to himself, and they are repressed as such; but the fear-emotion appears in consciousness disguised as hatred, of which it is a component. Anger against and hatred of democracy is prepared to admit. They are fully faced and rise into the full light of consciousness, although their real underlying cause is hidden.

Such an intensely fixed emotional idea, (hatred,) recurring whenever its object is presented to consciousness, is, in principle, an obsession, although it may not be so beyond control as to be pathological. But, as in the Kaiser's case, it may be only the apparent obsession, i. e., a defense reaction to the real obsession hidden in the subconscious. The Kaiser's actual obsession is a subconscious phobia, a fear of democracy for himself and his house.

It is interesting to notice in this connection how the national hatred of one nation for another is recognized by popular language as a phobia or fear. We speak of an Anglo-phobia, of a Russophobia, to describe the hatred of, let us say, Germany for England and Russia. Though the nation would not admit being afraid, nevertheless, by the very term employed, it is popularly recognized that the hatred is really though unconsciously the expression of a fear.

In the case of the Kaiser's phobia of democracy, the impulsive forces of the biological instincts of pugnacity, (anger,) fear, self-assertion, &c., provide the energy of the fighting spirit and carry to fruition his political ideas aimed at repressing the Social Democrats. This is exemplified by the Kaiser's exhortations, threats, and epithets hurled in his speeches at these alone of his political enemies, and by the laws enacted and the use of the lese-majesté to suppress them. By suppressing the Social Democracy he is defended from his peril. Hence, as I have said, anger and hatred is a defense reaction.

There are other ways in which the Kaiser's subconscious phobia unconsciously determines his mental behavior—by this I mean his modes or reasoning, his political principles and activities. As is well recognized not only by psychologists but by popular notions, such a repressed, unadmitted sentiment becomes a motivating force, a subconscious motive that directs our conscious reasonings.

Thus the Kaiser rationalizes, as psychologists say, his political objections to democracy—that is, unwilling to admit his real objections, he finds and formulates logical reasons why democracy is wrong and why his own opinions are right, really believing in them, perhaps, as God-given. Saving the introduction of the Deity, this is nothing more than what every one does who is unconsciously influenced by subconscious motives of which he is unaware.

When we say that a person is unconsciously influenced by this or that, unconsciously governed by a prejudice or sentiment like jealousy or fear or ambition or what not, we mean that he is governed by a motive which is subconscious, which he will not admit to himself, and of which he is therefore unaware. It determines his thoughts just as the hidden works of a clock determine the movements of the hands and chimes.

THE MORAL.

WHAT is the moral of all this? Surely the insight into the Kaiser's mind which a study of his sentiments and his phobia has given us reveals something more important than the mere personality of an exalted personage—exalted in the eyes of the world. It gives us an insight into the political forces which are wrestling within the German Empire for those ideals for which humanity has been striving through all the ages. And it reveals the forces upon which the world must count to overthrow Germanism.

If the powers of Europe want lasting peace through the overthrow of autocracy and militarism [illegible] Germanism, the character of the Kaiser points the way [illegible] of the democracy.

Gloom Cast Over Society by Lusitania Disaster—Officers of Atlantic Fleet to be Entertained—Society Pays Homage to Real Prince from India—Opening Day of Racing Season to be a Gala Society Event

SOCIETY is now passing through what is known as "the little season," a delightful interval between the post-Lenten gayeties and the opening of the outdoor social season, which, of course, means residence in the country or at the seashore, and all the allied pleasures and recreations.

It is a sort of mysterious period, for one never knows when it begins and when it ends, although to a great extent it is connected with the weather. A cold and drab Spring and a backward season, when Spring lingers in the lap of Winter, serves to prolong the little season. Informalities reign, however, while it lasts, and that is probably the reason why it is productive of so many small but interesting events.

The Lusitania disaster has cast a mantle of gloom over society, and many private entertainments are to be abandoned.

About this time of the year society is in a state of unrest, and there is much coming and going. The Summer villas must be looked after, and the gardens, and a certain amount of time given up to plans for the social campaign of the heated term. The town houses remain open and everybody, even while visiting and gadding about, still manages to keep in close touch with friends in town. So this is the reason why a hostess, wishing to give a luncheon or dinner, by verbal invitation, often over the telephone, is able to assemble a distinguished gathering, an almost impossible feat during the rush of the Winter season. There are no clashing dates to contend with, and the indoor gayeties are practically at a standstill. People are really glad of the opportunity to go somewhere, and they keep dropping in informally at these small affairs, and probably have a more enjoyable hour or so than at the large and formal functions of the big season.

Society will do its part in the entertainment of the officers of the Atlantic Fleet, which anchored yesterday in the Hudson, and a notable week is promised.

This is also the season when New York opens its door for distinguished visitors. The Panama-Pacific Exposition is attracting many notable visitors from the other side of the world despite the war, and society, of course, is extending the glad hand. A much-feted and picturesque group of visitors include the Maharaja of Kapurthala, his wife, Princess Prem Kaur, and their son, Prince Karimjit Singh. The Maharaja is one of the few ruling Princes of India who has been largely entertained by New York society, and he is a favorite also in the capitals of Europe. When society goes around the world it always knocks at the door of the Maharaja's palace in Kapurthala, where it is sure to find hospitality and all the luxury and brilliance of Arabian Nights entertainments.

While the entertaining here during the week for the royal group has been rather informal, a representative gathering of society has marked the luncheons and dinners given in their honor. Mrs. Vanderbilt, Mrs. Charles B. Alexander, and Mrs. F. Burrall Hoffman are among the hostesses who are entertaining the Maharaja, and Robert Goelet will probably give a small dance for the party before they leave on Wednesday on a chartered private car for the Pacific Coast, returning in July to sail for England. Yesterday they were the guests of Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney at the Meadow Brook Steeplechase Association's meet on the Whitney estate at Westbury, L. I.

THE outdoor events now are taking chances with the weather man, but so far none of the scheduled affairs has been marred by the rain. Polo will begin at the Piping Rock Club this week, also the racing season at Belmont Park, on Saturday, when the meeting of the United Hunts Racing Association will be held. The opening day of the metropolitan racing season, on May 20, promises to be one of the brilliant outdoor social affairs of the Spring. A portion of the receipts on that day are to be donated by the Westchester Racing Association to the Lafayette Fund and the Committee of Mercy, which have done a vast amount of relief work for the war sufferers, and the Blue Cross Association, which is looking after the war horses disabled in the great conflict.

Many private parties are being made up for the day. The Motor Car Touring Society, of which Albert Eugene Gallatin is President, will attend as the guests of Mr. Gallatin. Extra boxes are to be added for that day, so there will be a hundred of them available, such is the demand for them. Among those who have purchased boxes are Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Mrs. Peter Cooper Hewitt, Mrs. O. H. P. Belmont, Miss Barbara Rutherfurd, Mrs. William Payne Thompson, Mrs. Henry Alexander, Mrs. Ogden Mills, H. P. Whitney, August Belmont, Oliver Harriman, Frederick W. Vanderbilt, Pembroke Jones, and W. K. Vanderbilt, Jr.

HERE and there through May are scattered society weddings, and no matter what may be said to the contrary the brides are still wary of May weddings, which proves that the superstition of the Middle Ages has not wholly disappeared.

The weddings are being celebrated now to a large extent in the country, with a background of Spring verdure and flowers. Yesterday, at Hewlett, L. I., Miss Margaret Seton Porter, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. H. Hobart Porter, was married to John Tabb Ijams, both being prominent in the younger generation.

An interesting wedding last week was that of Mrs. Mabelle S. Moore, widow of Clarence Moore, victim of the Titanic disaster, and Aksel Christian Wichfeld of this city, which took place in Washington, D. C. Mr. Wichfeld, who is a Dane by birth and education, lives at the Ritz-Carlton and first came to this country four and a half years ago with Mrs. Henry P. Loomis of Tuxedo Park, who had been visiting his family abroad with her children. He is a nephew of the Danish Minister, Constantine Brun, now in Washington, his mother being Mrs. Brun's sister. His father was Court Chamberlain for many years to the old Danish King, father of Queen Alexandra and the Empress Marie, and two of his aunts were ladies-in-waiting to the Danish Queen, at the same time. One of his aunts is now head of an ancient castle, much like Hampton Court in England, provided many, many years ago by a Queen of Denmark as a home for all unmarried women of the Danish aristocracy. An elder brother is attached to the Danish Legation in London at the present time, thus serving his country during the war.

On May 26 will be celebrated the wedding of Miss Vera Bloodgood, daughter of Hildreth K. Bloodgood of this city, and Charles Scribner, Jr., son of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Scribner, of New York and Morristown, N. J. The couple's engagement was announced last week, the date of the wedding and the bridal attendants being announced at the same time. The ceremony is to take place in the Church of the Heavenly Rest, followed by a reception at the home of the bride's sister, Mrs. J. Macy Willets, in West Fifty-second Street, with whom Miss Bloodgood has been passing the Winter.

Mrs. Willets is to act as matron of honor, and the other attendants will be Mrs. George Saltonstall West, Mrs. Theodore P. Dixon, Mrs. Arthur A. Fowler, and Mrs. Mary Rand of Minneapolis. Clarence Van S. Mitchell will be Mr. Scribner's best man, and the ushers will include J. Macy Willets, R. Taller Townsend, Nicholas Tilney, Edward Law, Rudolph Rauch, Archibald D. Russell, Jr., Philip Boyer, and G. Dawson Coleman of Philadelphia.

Arrangements have been completed for the wedding of Miss Mary Nammack, daughter of Dr. Charles E. Nammack of this city, and John Neville Boyle, which is to be solemnized on Tuesday, in the Lady Chapel of St. Patrick's Cathedral. Only relatives and intimate friends are to attend, and it is expected that Cardinal Farley will officiate. A bridal breakfast will follow at the home of the bride in East Twenty-ninth Street. Later the couple will leave for the Pacific Coast and the Canadian Rockies on their honeymoon. Mr. Boyle is a graduate of Columbia University, class of '06, and also of the Columbia Law School. He was Captain of the Columbia crew in 1907 that defeated Harvard University. After serving as Assistant United States District Attorney, he is now a member of a law firm of this city.

A suburban wedding on Saturday, for which a special train will convey the guests from New York, will be that of Miss Dorothy Wehrhane, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Wehrhane, and a débutante of last Winter, and Herbert Gardiner Lord, Jr., son of Professor Herbert G. Lord of Columbia University and Mrs. Lord. The ceremony will be performed at 4 o'clock at Broad Acres, the Wehrhane house at Llewellyn Park, Orange, N. J.

Miss Lucy Lord, the bridegroom's sister, is to be maid of honor, and the bridesmaids will be the Misses Elizabeth Griggs, Mally Lord, Virginia Gibson, Louise Wise of Wilmington, N. C., and Edith Greenough of Missoula, Mon. The young Misses Katharine Huyck of Albany and Alice Parsons of this city are to serve as flower girls.

Thomas Lord will be best man. The ushers will include Truman Parker Handy, John Alden Cook, Warren R. Smith, John B. Marsh, Richard N. Pierson, and William B. Powell of Cleveland, Ohio.

DULLNESS has settled down in the ranks of the young people more than among the older folks. Several weeks have passed now, with little or no dancing. Perhaps what some people term the worldly pleasures have had a setback under the influence of the near-by evangelistic campaign of Billy Sunday. This is hardly likely, though, because the evangelist has been bearding the lion in its den, as it were. His knocks against the sins of society are frequent and well aimed, yet on his third Monday visit to the city he had luncheon in the very midst of society's realm, in upper Fifth Avenue. As the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Elbert H. Gary, at their palatial town house, 856 Fifth Avenue, he expressed himself afterward as having "a mighty fine time." In addition to a small group of prominent men, there were present also Mme. de Gama, wife of the Brazilian Ambassador; Mrs. F. Egerton Webb, and Mrs. Claus Spreckels.

With Billy Sunday lunching on Fifth Avenue and General Victoriano Huerta, the ex-President of Mexico, leasing a fine residence on Long Island for permanent occupancy, stranger things may happen, but society seems prepared for anything nowadays. The presence of General Huerta and his family on Long Island, however, will, no doubt, add to the picturesqueness and novelty of the approaching Summer season, as they will, no doubt, be seen at many of the outdoor affairs.

Mrs. Emily A. Bassbor, widow of C. Hazeltine Bsshor and mother of Mrs. Alfred G. Vanderbilt, has sold her country place in Dorchester County, Md., and is to make her permanent home in this city.

According to the will of Lieut. William L. Breese of the Royal Horse Guards of the British Army, who was killed at the front in France in March, he left his entire estate, valued at $60,000, to his wife, who was Miss Julia Fish, daughter of Hamilton Fish. He left two sons, Hamilton Fish Breese and William L. Breese.

A son was born last week to Mr. and Mrs. Philip Stevenson of Westbury, L. I. Mrs. Stevenson was formerly Miss Emily Randolph. The christening of Viscount Forbes, the infant son of the Earl and Countess Granard, took place in London last Tuesday. The child, the grandson of Mr. and Mrs. Ogden Mills, received the name of Arthur Patrick Hastings.

ALLIANCES between prominent families in New York and Philadelphia seem to be on the increase. The Duke-Biddle alliance was one of the first of note. Last week the engagement of Miss Mary L. Davis, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Nathan H. Davis of Overbrook, Penn., to James B. Work, Jr., son of Mr. and Mrs. J. Henry Work of Lawrence, L. I., was announced. Mr. Work is a member of the Rockaway Hunt Club and the Mayflower Descendants.

From the Pacific Coast comes the announcement of the engagement of Miss Enid Shaw, daughter of the former Secretary of the Treasury, Leslie M. Shaw, and Mrs. Shaw, to John McMillan, a banker, of this city. The wedding will probably take place in this city in October.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles de Kay have announced the engagement of their daughter, Miss Marion Eckford de Kay, to Dr. Peyton Ross of 123 East Sixty-second Street, who is a member of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research. The wedding is set for June.

The engagement of Miss Ruth Beakley Smith of Brooklyn and John L. Kuschke of this city has been announced. Miss Smith is the daughter of the late Mrs. J. Beakley Smith and a granddaughter of Mrs. Joseph Inness, a sister-in-law of the late George Inness, the famous landscape painter. She makes her home with her grandmother. Mr. Kuschke is a graduate of Cornell University, class of '09, and is a member of the Faculty of the Collegiate School in New York.

Judge and Mrs. Joseph F. Mulqueen have announced the engagement of their daughter, Miss Mary K. Mulqueen, to Thompson Bertrand Graham. From Albany comes the announcement of the engagement of Miss Jane Ogden, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Ogden of that city, prominent in Albany society and an ardent charity worker, to Frederick C. Tanner of New York, the Republican State Chairman.

Mrs. Gershom A. Seixas has announced the engagement of her daughter, Miss Helen Mayo Seixas, to A. Stedman Hills of this city, son of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph A. Hills of Boston. Their wedding will take place shortly in All Angels' Church, and will be quiet owing to the recent death of the bride's father. Mr. Hills is a Harvard graduate and belongs to the Harvard Club of this city, the Amateur Comedy, and Atlantic Yacht Clubs.

JUNE weddings are to be numerous, according to the plans now being announced.

The marriage of Miss Mary L. Duke, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Benjamin N. Duke of Fifth Avenue and Eighty-ninth Street, and Anthony J. Drexel Biddle, Jr., of Philadelphia, is to be celebrated on June 16 at the residence of her uncle, James B. Duke, at Somerville, N. J., one of the finest estates in that part of the country. Miss Duke's father has recently leased Mrs. Cyril Dugmore's place at Great Neck, L. I., for the Summer and will take possession on July 1. The property was first reported as having been leased to Cornelius Vanderbilt.

The wedding of Miss Elinor Lee, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Lee, and Malcolm Douglas Sloane, son of the late William Douglas Sloane, will be quietly celebrated on Thursday, June 3, at the home of the bride's parents, 24 Gramercy Park. Mr. Sloane has taken an apartment at 585 Park Avenue, where it is supposed the newly-weds will make their home.

Miss Lisa C. Suydam, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John R. Suydam, and Paul Renshaw, whose engagement was recently announced, are to be married on June 2, at the home of her parents, 918 Madison Avenue.

Two out-of-town weddings in June of interest to New Yorkers will include that, on June 5, at Beverly, Mass., of Miss Hope Norman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Guy Norman, and Elliot C. Bacon, son of the former Ambassador to France; and also that of Miss Louise Converse, daughter of Frederick S. Converse, the composer, and Junius Spencer Morgan, son of Mr. and Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan, which is to be celebrated on June 15, at Boston.

Plans have been announced for the wedding of Miss Frances Staunton Peck, the daughter of Staunton Peck, formerly of Chicago, but now of Philadelphia, and Vivian H. Egleston, son of the late George W. Egleston. It will take place at 4 o'clock on the afternoon of Tuesday, June 1, in the Church of the Transfiguration, East Twenty-ninth Street, and the Rev. Dr. George H. Houghton will perform the ceremony.

Miss Peck will have Miss Ada Norfleet of Memphis, Tenn., as her maid of honor, and the bridesmaids selected are Miss Edna Moverly, formerly of Chicago, now of New York, and a cousin of Miss Peck; Miss Sarah Margaret Rowe of Pittsburgh, Miss Ruth Teal of Portland, Ore., and Miss Alice De Lamar of New York.

Mr. Egleston will have Lawrence C. Hull as his best man, and the ushers selected are Thomas Bloodgood Peck, uncle of the bride; Francis R. Appleton, Jr., Reginald Lanier, and Harold Stuart.

The reception will be held at the home of the bride's grandmother, Mrs. Thomas Bloodgood Peck, 111 East Thirty-fourth Street, with whom Miss Peck has spent the Winter.

SOCIETY is completing plans for the Summer, and the resorts are preparing for an active season. Newport especially is looking forward to a most brilliant Summer, and almost every cottage or villa has been taken. Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, Jr., has just leased Mrs. Lorillard Spencer's villa known as Chasteleaux. This is the first time that Mrs. Spencer has rented her villa. Last season Mrs. Vanderbilt occupied Beechwood, the house belonging to Vincent Astor. Mrs. George T. Bliss has leased the Huntington place, recently bought by L. Cass Ledyard, at Newport, and Miss Helen O. Brice has leased the Bancroft place, while Mrs. Kingsland Bradford has rented the Dr. W. T. Bull estate at Middletown, R. I. August Belmont, Jr., has purchased the house of Mr. and Mrs. Edward S. Knapp near Bay Shore, L. I. Mrs. Herbert G. Lord and Mrs. Gordon Wordell are among those who have taken cottages at York Harbor, Me.

Hundreds of New Yorkers are now attending the Panama-Pacific Exposition and visiting at other points in California. Mr. and Mrs. A. Murray Young, Mr. and Mrs. B. Ogden Chisolm, Miss Anne Morgan, Miss Marjorie Curtis, and Miss Louise Parsons are among the recent arrivals there.

Mrs. Stewart L. Woodford gave a dinner last Thursday at the Waldorf-Astoria, followed by dancing in the grill room. The Duchess of Manchester and the Duchess de Chaulnes have gone to the White Sulphur Springs, W. Va., for the remainder of the Spring season. Miss Frederick Pearson and Miss Lesley E. Pearson left yesterday for that resort.

SOCIETY is to have a gala night this week, when the Metropolitan Opera season is reopened for one night, for a benefit performance of "Carmen," with an all-star cast. Thursday, May 13, is the date selected, the original date having been changed three times during the past few days in order to make possible the securing of the most famous operatic stars and the full Metropolitan orchestra and corps de ballet.

The list of patronesses is headed by Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, Mrs. Ogden Mills, and Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney, and the entire proceeds will go to the Sewing Girls of Paris Fund, of which Condé Nast is Chairman in this country. This charity is for the thousands of young "midinettes," who sew on the gowns in the establishments of the famous Paris couturieres, and who are now for the most part out of employment. All of the principals in the production have donated their services.

Mr. Nast, Henry Rogers Winthrop, Treasurer of the fund, and Frank Crowninshield, together with others of the committee, are organizing the affair, and have obtained the consent of all of the Metropolitan boxholders to donate their boxes for resale. Pretty young débutantes, appropriately costumed, will sell programs. Despite the fact that it is to be an all-star production, the scale of prices is to be less than the regular opera schedule.

Miss Farrar is to sing the title rôle, and Mme. Alda is to be Micaela. Martinelli, Amato, Miss Leonora Sparkes, Andreas de Segurola, Miss Sophie Braslau, Robert Leonhardt, Albert Reiss, and Désiré Defrère are the other artists.

A concert will be held at the Ritz-Carlton on Tuesday afternoon, the proceeds to be devoted to the work of the Girls' Protective League and Employment Exchange. The artists will include Miss Geraldine Farrar, Mr. and Mrs. Ossip Gabrilowitsch, and Francis Rogers. Miss Charlotte A. Barnes of 10 East Seventy-ninth Street is receiving applications for tickets. The headquarters of the league are at 162 Madison Avenue. Mrs. James A. Burden, Jr., Mrs. E. S. Harkness, Miss Mabel Choate, Mrs. Douglas Robinson, Mrs. Willard D. Straight, and Mrs. Robert S. Brewster are among the patronesses.

STYLES NOW BEING ARRANGED FOR GIRL GRADUATES

Dresden Silks with Groups of Flowers in Pastel Colors, Soft Frilled Satins and Striped Silks Replace Stiff, Heavy Goods—Organdies, Fine Net and Flowered Muslin Are Prominent Materials for Which Early Summer Fashions Will Be Notable.

JUNE suggests such charming thoughts, its very name is a conjurer of mental pictures, of blue skies and roses, new leaves quivering in the sun and green lawns turned silvery under the moon. Sixty days instead of thirty would be none too many for this queen of the calendar.

All sweet things are sacred to it. Roses, the most fragrant of all flowers; strawberries, the most delicious of all fruits, and the sweet girl graduate, the dearest of all girls.

June is the month of the girl graduate, the time when she invades adult society, pushes aside its maturer functions, and monopolizes its attention with the ceremonial of her commencement and its attendant festivities. Morning, afternoon, and evening entertainments are dedicated to her, both before and after the momentous day when her precious badge of membership among the initiated is publicly presented to her. There is a lot of hard work to be accomplished first, of course; examinations, terrifyingly final, loom large in her thoughts. But, larger yet, if she is a true daughter of Eve, looms the problem of her gowning during this important period.

For the past few years this matter of appropriate clothes for a girl graduate has been a difficulty. Our garments have been too Oriental, too magnificent, too sophisticated, for the age which is no longer childhood nor yet quite womanhood.

This difficulty has been more keenly felt by Americans than by any one else. The jeune fille of France is kept so rigidly in the background, hemmed in by convention, educated in seclusion by the most proper of governesses. She never "graduates" in a series of special functions, with festivities and gayeties especially arranged for girls. So the problem of her clothes is a less complicated one for her French mother to consider.

The German "backfisch," as she is familiarly called in the Fatherland, monopolizes scarcely more of the clothes designer's consideration than her French sister. She is kept to serge and sailor dresses, like her English prototype, the "flapper." It is only in America that the young girl is a definite and conspicuous factor in the lives of her elders. Her gayeties, and the clothes she wears to them, are matters of intense importance to the family and to the whole circle of her acquaintance. If there are no special designs for her in Dame Fashion's mode books, then she willfully adopts those intended for her elders. Up-to-date, fashionable garments she must have, and so, in recent years, we have seen not only "mutton dressed as lamb," but lamb decked out as mutton, which is an even sadder spectacle to those who dislike the inappropriate.

The season of 1915 has been gracious to the young girl. Never were styles so appropriate to her. Visions of the age of innocence must have floated before the eyes of their designers. All that suggests youth triumphant, from many a historical epoch of costume, is revived today, touched with modern genius, and given to the world as the "Fashions of 1915."

YOUTHFUL FROCK, PINK AND WHITE.
Pink and white checked linen with sleeves and front of white linen.

The short, voluminous skirts, sometimes seven whole inches from the ground; the tight little bodices, with their artless round waists or old-fashioned pointed basques; the demure collars and cuffs—all these are features of the new designs that seem to demand the adolescent figure to wear them properly.

Even materials are youthful. Gone are the gorgeous brocades, stiff with threads of precious metal. Gone are the swathing lines of satiny drapery, which accentuated the lines of the form they were supposed to conceal. Gone are the dignified silken trains sweeping behind us. In their places are Dresden silks, with groups of flowers in pastel colors, crisp taffetas trimmed with prominent ruches, soft frilled satins in shades of pink, blue, and lavender, striped silks that look as if they came from the wardrobes of our grandmothers. For more summery days there are artless flowered muslins, lace in small and dainty patterns and fine weaves, and that most girlish of all materials, white organdie.

For the graduation ceremony itself this last material is surely the most alluring. The days of elaborate gowns of valuable fabrics, rich laces, complicated embroideries, and stiff satins are long gone by. Simplicity and youthfulness are the keynotes of these gowns today. They must be frilly to date themselves of this season, but what girl is averse to furbelows? Skirts in tiers of flounces, three or four, gathered upon a soft, thin foundation, are popular and charming. In the bodice part a soft pale shade in taffeta silk may be introduced in the form of a half-fitting basque. Old rose, nattier blue, nile green, maize, are some of the colors which suggest themselves to combine with white. If such a basque is used it may take the form of a pointed bodice or a little coatee with a sash belt and peplum below the waist. Sometimes there is a little moyen age affair, cut straight, continuing below the waist, the lower edge finished in square tabs, the fronts laced together with a cord or ribbon of the same color. The skirt material is introduced again as sleeves, or collar, or soft surplice fronts between the fronts of the basque.

Other materials besides organdie are employed to carry out these models. Fine net is very satisfactory for a ruffled skirt. It has no crispness to lose in damp weather, and does not require frequent pressing in order to look well. Flowered muslin is another idea revived from the civil war times which has inspired so many gowns this season. These last are perhaps colorful enough to be employed alone, or with only a sash belt of soft satin ribbon at the natural waistline. These colored belts, by the way, are a pretty adjunct of a Summer gown which has returned to us again. Several of them in different becoming shades may be worn in turn with the same white gown. The effect is very young, indeed too young for any one older than a preparatory school graduate.

With her net and taffeta gown the girl may wear stockings of the same color as her bodice, and black slippers laced with black or colored ribbons. Her hat may be of the shepherdess variety, simply trimmed with a wreath of silk or satin flowers, very small and conventional, the shade that she has chosen to predominate. Or the hat may have a ribbon band and streamers of the favored color.

A dainty calling gown will be required for the dances which are sure to make part of the graduate's entertainment. Here she will probably choose taffeta, as crispness is the quality most to be desired in such a frock. A full, short skirt and a pointed bodice, the upper part brightened by tulle or chiffon, is the most desirable model to choose. A new tendency in these skirts is to confine their bouffant desires somewhat by tucking them up under the hem and catching them into place with a rosebud.

A fascinating frock would be a pale turquoise taffeta with a voluminous skirt restrained in this way with pink roses. The bodice would be fitted with old-fashioned darts to the figure, and pointed in front. The top part would be fine white lace over flesh pink chiffon, and a rose or two would be tucked into the corner of the square décolletage.

BLUE SERGE WITH BRASS BUTTONS.
Blue serge coat suit trimmed with brass buttons and collar embroidered in gold. Model by Georgette.

Another charming idea for a taffeta evening frock is to cut away the taffeta around the bottom of the skirt and replace it by a circular flounce, not gathered but set in plainly, of double chiffon, which allows a skimpy petticoat of white lace looped with tiny pink rosebuds to peep coyly through it.

Daytime garments must also be considered, and here, among the new suits, it really seems as if choice were made far easier for the subdébutante than for her older sisters. The models are flagrantly, flauntingly youthful. There are little plaid silk affairs with very short, jaunty jackets of grosgrain silk in a plain shade to wear with them. Plaid is an almost certain success for the very young girl, and a great risk for her elders. Kilt skirts suspended by bretelles of the same are plain white linen blouses, and worn with little dark blue silk coats with brass buttons are charming for girls.

With such a blouse she should wear the new collar, which seems designed especially for her. It is called the "Eton," and is an exact replica of that worn by the schoolboys of that famous institution. A French designer gave it its name. In fact, English names have been largely used to designate the new Paris models this year for the first time in sartorial history. The English and French, having been the "dearest enemies" of each other during nearly 1,000 years, now find themselves, apparently much to their mutual satisfacton, fighting like brothers on the same side. A reflection of this state of affairs is shown in the names of the new Paris clothes.

One of the best of the imported suits bears the name "Rugby." The Eton collar has been adopted with enthusiasm, and another English idea has found its way via Paris to us in the cricket blazers which the French houses are offering to their girl patrons as sport coats. These are manly affairs, single breasted, with real pockets, made in wide stripes of two colors, and worn with the white skirts and blouses which become almost a uniform later in the season.

By the way, the latest material for these separate skirts is white corduroy. In a soft, wide-welted variety, it is newer than either linen or duck. The new model has pockets buttoned down with brass buttons. For country club wear nothing is smarter than a corduory skirt, with a handkerchief linen blouse striped with a hairline of color—say Dutch blue. With this are worn an Eton collar and a big bow tie of striped silk. Choose your school or college colors if you will or a fanciful combination which will carry out your color scheme. The belt for this costume may be of various styles. The wide leather belt, particularly becoming to a young, supple figure, is again in favor, and is made in charming colors. Indorsed by the most fastidious wearers is the military belt of striped ribbon with a regulation military buckle.

The shoes for a sports costume deserve an article to themselves. The newest are of white buckskin combined with colored leather. The toecaps and the strap across the vamps, which are familiar features of the rubber-soled, heelless, buckskin shoes, are now made of another leather, dark blue, green, or black patent leather. If you have chosen blue as your color, take these shoes in blue and white and wear with them white stockings with heavy clocks of blue.

In young girls' hats the wide Reboux sailor undoubtedly leads in favor. It is severely plain this year, worn rather tilted, and trimmed with a band and flat princess bow of striped or checked belting ribbon. Newer perhaps is a sort of baretta of black satin. This has a tight straw band around the head, and the satin is cut in four sections and pointed in front and behind and at each side. Charming are the woven silk caps, ending in a tassel, which are pulled over the crown of a sailor hat and dangle off the brim at one side.

The cricket blazers are the newest of the sport coats, but the vogue of the sweater is by no means at an end. The variety of these useful garments is greater than ever. Some models are very elaborate affairs of knitting, combining two colors in stripes and squares, in an endless variety of patterns. But the simpler the better for the young girl. A solid color with white edges, or a white with colored borders, or one of the new tapestry edges, may be worn for all kinds of occasions. They may be found to suit every purse in fine Jersey silk with tasseled sashes and wide collars, costing a small fortune, or in the humbler, but at the same time warmer, wool in beautiful colors. The new ones open down the front for a short distance, close again with crocheted buttons, and are put on over the head. Nearly all of them have pockets in which one can bury one's hands on a chilly morning.

The one-piece gowns of linen and washable materials which the French houses are sending over all look as if they were designed for the jeune fille, so her American cousin should have no difficulty in suiting herself in these. Jeanne Lauvin, the costumer of youth, is responsible for many of the best of them. They show the same salient characteristics, the same "milkmaid" effects as the more elaborate confections. Two materials are often combined for them. A white linen, elaborate enough for an afternoon occasion, of rather fine material, has a ruffled skirt and plain bodice, with trim belt and long sleeves, and all the edges everywhere are bound with a bias fold of colored linen, in a half-inch width.

A checked linen is trimmed with plain, and a plain one with plaid, and so it goes. Plain white ones have buttons to enliven them; and colored leather belts are used with good results. Skirt pockets make such frocks practical and help to ornament them at the same time. Smocking has been revived as a trimming, and delightful results are achieved by this means with washable colored threads. Altogether it is the age of girls, and they have been honored as never before by the attention of the great French arbiters of fashion. Small wonder if they feel flattered by it, and important.

FACTS ABOUT SPRING FASHIONS

Bound with Leather.

A FROCK of Georgette crêpe is made with three ruffles on the skirt, each bound with a narrow edge of black leather. The same black leather is used for a belt and to bind on the bodice.

Braid-Bound Frocks.

A good many of the new models are bound with braid. There is an interesting white piqué model, imported by Jeanne Lauvin, that shows a binding of black braid. The result is startling and really very attractive. And Lauvin, who seems to like braid for binding, has a charming coat suit for a young girl, blue bound with white. There are also some good models of serge or gabardine with jackets and skirts bound along the edges with black silk braid.

Fruit-Trimmed Ruffs.

Neck ruffs of tulle and ribbon are much worn and they are especially becoming with the frocks of the season. They are made in brown, dark blue, black and sometimes white. And some of the smartest and newest have a line of tiny flowers, in different gay colors, or small fruits, cherries or apples, placed at regular intervals all around the neck. Some of these ruffs are made to flare out and up and down only at the back. A band of velvet ribbon clasps the throat in front and holds them in position.

Draped Skirts Again.

That there is not perfect satisfaction, either in the minds of their makers or of their wearers, with the full, short skirt, is shown by several apparently unimportant details of fashion. One of these is that the designers, some of them, are experimenting with a draped skirt—a skirt unlike the draped skirt of a couple of seasons ago, that was slashed and narrow, but a full skirt, draped in most interesting fashion. This skirt is usually rather long, but its fullness is so arranged around the ankles that when its wearer steps the skirt rides up to the height of the shoe tops. When she stands still it falls to its lower level. The new skirt is sometimes draped under a pointed tunic or overskirt, sometimes it is draped under a straight back panel.

Point d'Esprit Again.

Point d'esprit is used to good effect in some of the afternoon frocks of the Summer. It is elaborately made up, as a rule, over satin foundations, trimmed with much lace. But with all the elaboration of making and trimming it retains its characteristic daintiness and charm.

Silver Buttons Still Used.

Silver buttons, that made a strong appearance last year, are still used, and perhaps the military influence on clothes has given them a stronger appeal than they had then. They are ball-shaped, usually, although sometimes the old flat ones are used. Brass buttons, too, are a good deal used, sometimes with good effect on white linen suits.

Colored Handkerchiefs.

Colored handkerchiefs are perhaps more usual nowadays than plain white ones—at least handkerchiefs showing some color, even if only a little. There are pretty ones of crêpe de chine in plain light colors—yellow, pink, violet and blue. There are others with colored borders, and many with colored embroidery.

Striped Silks.

There are a great many striped silks this Spring. Usually one stripe is decidedly wider than the other—the narrower one is of the hair or pin stripe variety. Some new silks are of tan, a rich shade, striped with brown or black. Then there are striped pongees, striped with light blue or pink or green. There are black and white and blue and white in endless variety, too.

THE PUMP OF 1915

THERE is one pleasant thing about the pump of this Spring of 1915. If the foot is once persuaded to squeeze through the narrow ankle opening it is likely to stay in place.

Yes, the pump of 1915 clings tenaciously to the foot, for the reason that it is built well up over the heel and the instep. It is no longer the low-cut pump that is cut out almost to the toes. It fits smoothly and snugly well over the instep and holds itself in place.

And really this new pump is not so difficult to get into. A shoehorn is absolutely essential. But then, even a pump cut out over the instep ought always to be adjusted with the help of a shoehorn. And as for toe room, there is as much of that in these new pumps as there is in any of the season's shoes. Although they are all cut on an apparently narrow last, they are quite comfortable.

Many inexpensive little shoehorns are sold, and one might well invest in several of these, so that one will always be on hand. Some with handles that are shoe buttoners are sold in little leather cases. The handles fold shut and so make the shoehorn very small and compact. The cheapest of these costs less than twenty cents. It is small enough so that it could be easily carried in the handbag.

SECOND THOUGHTS ON FIRST NIGHTS

The Undependable Curtain—
"Children of Earth"—Some Cousinly Confusion.

WHEN the theatrical millennium is here, the cut-throat ticket, like Wallack's, will be a thing of the past, the busy speculator will have gone to his reward, and the good company of playgoers will be animated by that fine friendliness to which Augustus Thomas's memories turned with affection and regret at a recent notable farewell. And in those happy days not only will every curtain rise at the appointed hour, but every patron will be in his seat to witness that pleasurable and not unimportant preliminary to the evening's entertainment.

This matter of the curtain's rising is not one of all obliterating consequence, but it counts. Indeed, when "What's the Matter With the Theatre" comes to oe written, there must be some paragraphs reserved for it in that chapter devoted to the gradual attrition or nibbling at the playgoing public by the irresistible forces of stupidity.

Managers and playgoers alike are to blame, but only the managers can lead the way in the abatement of the nuisance. It cannot be done overnight. The task is not easy. Like all the problems of the New York theatre, it is complicated by the circumstance that Broadway's playgoing public is a distractingly conglomerate and ceaselessly shifting population. Not the neglible first act of the Sardou convention nor the occasional curtain-raiser of the London stage now offers adequate solution. Probably the way out lies through a concerted determination to announce exactly and truthfully the moment of the curtain's rising, and then a resolute insistence that the patron see all of the first act or none of it. Such conversion will take time. It is a matter of education and this part of the millennium could be hastened by the sweet uses of advertisement. (In their own programs, if they like. Who cares?) Certainly the first stern exclusion of the tardy ones would raise a hubbub that could be heard as far as Timbuctoo and would serve arresting notice that a new order of things had gone into effect.

Granted that the late comers thus ruthlessly penalized would bluster and sulk. Granted that some would flounce out of the theatre vowing as loudly as possible that they would never, never darken its doors again. And what if they did obey so naughty an impulse? How many patrons have been lost under the present order? Who knows? What of the literal soul who has assumed that the curtain would rise as advertised and, as reward for his punctuality, has bored in his seat for an irrevocable quarter of an hour without even an orchestra to console him? What of the peace-loving playgoer whose first act memories are ever of large women occupying his knees in passing and of large men stepping callously on his toes? And how do these memories affect his decision the next time there is an evening free and the choice is between the play and a rubber of auction?

There is altogether too much uncertainty about it. There must be some consideration surely for the reviewer who, earlier in the season, reported querulously that, assuming an 8:15 announcement meant an 8:30 curtain, he had come at 8:45 only to find that he had been cruelly betrayed into hearing the overture of an indifferent musical comedy. Surely there should be some amends made to the distinguished and quite inconsolable critic from Morningside Heights who, feeling recently that to attend the first act of "Ghosts" on a fine Spring afternoon was rather more than he could bear, came thirty minutes late only to find that the first act was still a matter for apprehensive anticipation.

But these memories invite a consideration of the first-night problem, which, while acute enough in all conscience, is, like the Metropolitan's, very special. The first-nighters are an incorrigible lot, but for the rest, while the way out is hardly so easy as rolling off a log, a good deal can be done. The sheer novelty of truth in the announcements and a little compulsory education would do much. The theatre-going public must be taught better habits. Particularly those who make up what the managers like to call the "carriage trade" must be taught better manners.

Merely to abide sternly by the advertised hour for the curtain's rising is not enough. That is done faithfully and stubbornly at the Metropolitan, and while the puzzling problem of the Opera House is a peculiar one, it is sufficiently illustrative. The music-loving public is gloomily resigned to hearing the first and last scenes of the operatic masterpieces to the accompaniment of lisping silks, shuffling feet and clattering seats. If your neighbor boasts that he once listened undisturbed to the great last act of "Boris Godunow," he may have gone of a Saturday night, but the chances are he has been abroad. And the occupants of the more modest seats at the Metropolitan never miss a chance to tell the story of the skeptical boxholder and patron of music who said he had been told Caruso sang a splendid aria in the first act of "Aida."

If the problem of the theatre curtain hardly matches that of the great golden draperies at the Opera House, it is pressing enough to deserve consideration. If, in the near future, the managers come to an agreement about the cut-throat ticket, they might, in that moment of harmony, take up once and for all the question of the tricks and manners of the tardy playgoer. The millennium may be lost in the mists of the future, but the first week in August is just around the corner.

ARTHUR HOPKINS is one of those younger and more adventurous producers toward whom the American theatregoer has begun to look hopefully, and many should find both entertaining and suggestive the article printed elsewhere on this page wherein the producer of "The Poor Little Rich Girl" writes something of his own little private system of picking plays.

In paying his disrespects to the present public, he brings forth as a double illustration of its discouraging and benighted taste not only the brilliant success of "The Man Who Married a Dumb Wife" and "Androcles and the Lion," but the dismal failure of "Children of Earth." Now, Mr. Hopkins is entitled to his own preferences, but this implicates Mr. Ames. Graphically the writer pictures Alice Brown's play gathering dust in the ever hospitable storehouse, and its producer sitting with head bowed in his hands, wondering, wondering. The posture is hardly characteristic, the picture just a little unconvincing. Mr. Hopkins has a right to say he liked "Children of Earth," but what is his warrant for saying Mr. Ames did? There is here the distinct suggestion that Mr. Ames thought the prize play was a fine play and one the public would take to its heart. Which seems very, very doubtful.

THE columns of the London newspapers are not the most cheerful reading these days, but they have their bright spots and here is one of them.

"The writers had the signal advantage of the assistance of that celebrated American detective, William J. Burns." Thus Fred Terry in The Daily Telegraph on the eve of the recent London production of "The Argyle Case." And he goes on to say: "It was he, as you doubtless remember, who ran to earth the dynamitards during the labour troubles in America, when every bit of structural work in process of erection was wrecked by dynamite, and wholesale anarchy prevailed in nearly every State."

At the Folies Bali.

A unique entertainment will be given at the Danse des Follies above the New Amsterdam tomorrow night, when Flo Ziegfeld's company that has been presenting the 1914 "Follies" on tour the past year will join forces with "The Midnight Frolic" company in a program of acts taken from both entertainments. The entire cast and chorus of the road organization will take part, and many of the principal comedy scenes and ensemble numbers will be given. Dancing will precede the performance.

EURIPIDES FOR THE ELIS

THAT upstanding bowl under the inverted blue bowl of the Yale sky will be used for the first time as a place of dramatic entertainment next Saturday afternoon when Granville Barker will make his first American production of a Greek tragedy in it. The performance will be the "Iphigenia in Tauris" of Euripides, and the performance will be the first of a series of presentations of it and "Trojan Women" to be given by the Barkers in the amphitheatres of the Eastern colleges.

Among the 10,000 or more spectators who will assemble in the bowl for the performance will be many from New York, who will make the pilgrimage to New Haven by motor or train. The tragedy will be performed in the late afternoon, according to the ancient custom, on a stage pladed in the centre of the bowl. It was designed by Norman Wilkinson, who did the decorations for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and is modeled after the stages of the ancient Greek amphitheatres. It is a portable stage that will be dismantled and shipped from stadium to stadium. Mr. Wilkinson also designed the costumes, and the coloring will be one of the chief beauties of the spectacle.

There will be an orchestra of fifty musicians, under the direction of Elliot Schenck, to play special incidental music composed by Professor David Smith of Yale.

Lillah McCarthy will play the rôle of Iphigenia, and other principals will be Edith Wynne Matthison, Chrystal Herne, Gladys Hanson, Alma Kruger, Mary Forbes, Lionel Braham, Ian Maclaren, Leonard Willey, Claude Rains, and Philip Merrivale. These, with a score of young women who will compose the chorus, went to New Haven last night to continue rehearsals through the week.

After the performance at Yale Mr. Barker and his company will go on to Cambridge for presentations in the Harvard Stadium on May 18 of "Iphigenia in Tauris," and May 19 of "Trojan Women." Dates of the other performances will be the College of the City of New York, "Trojan Women," May 29; "Iphigenia in Tauris," May 31; "Trojan Women," June 2; "Iphigenia in Tauris," June 5; University of Pennsylvania, "Iphigenia in Tauris," June 8; "Trojan Women," June 9; Princeton University, "Iphigenia in Tauris," June 11, and "Trojan Women," June 12.

BONSTELLE CELEBRATION.

Jessie Bonstelle, who played a brief engagement in stock in the West End Theatre recently, has just celebrated her one thousandth appearance as a stock actress in Buffalo. Miss Bonstelle chose Hazelton's "Mistress Nell" for the occasion, that being the play in which she made her first appearance in Buffalo nine years ago. The esteem in which she is held there was reflected in a diamond and platinum pendant presented by Mayor Louis P. Fuhrmann and 400 residents.

Miss Bonstelle has a list of 6,000 subscribers for a New York season, and she is looking for a more centrally located theatre than the West End.

THE FIRST-NIGHT CALENDAR.

"A FULL HOUSE"—A new farce by Fred Jackson, tomorrow night in the Longacre Theatre.

"IL TROVATORE"—Verdi's opera revived by the Van den Berg-Conger Opera Company as its opening offering tomorrow night in the Standard Theatre.

COLUMBIA THEATRE—Annual Summer burlesque production tomorrow afternoon, featuring Lew Kelly.

"777:10"—A farce in German, Wednesday night in the Irving Place Theatre.

SUMMER is impending in the theatres. The cretonne chair coverings are being brought out in those playhouses which contemplate remaining open during the heated season, while in the box-offices of some of the others the treasurers are making sacrificial offerings of cut-rate tickets for the continuance of cool weather, knowing that with the arrival of a stretch of warm days their doors will automatically shut. Tomorrow will usher in the first of the crop of warm weather entertainments, the group including a farce, an opera and a Summer burlesque production.

The title of the farce H. H. Frazee has prepared for his Longacre Theatre suggests the title of the one that kept the playhouse open during the vacation period last year. It is "A Full House," although it has nothing to do with cards as was the case with "A Pair of Sixes."

The title of Fred Jackson's new farce refers to the crowded home of the Howells following a hurried trip of Mr. Newly-wed Howell to Boston. Mr. Howell is a lawyer and the day after his wedding is called to Boston to look after the affairs of young Ned Pembroke, who is in love with his wife's sister and is trying to settle a previous affair with a member of the chorus. On his way home Howell mixes traveling bags with a thief, which leads to many complications when he arrives home.

The cast includes Herbert Corthell, May Vokes, George Parsons, Elizabeth Nelson, Ralph Morgan, Edgar Norton, Clarbourne Foster, Maude Turner Gordon, Ida Darling, Claire Weiden, Bernice Buck, Charles Goodrich, and Arthur P. Hyman. Edgar MacGregor staged the play.

The Van den Berg-Conger Opera Company will begin a limited engagement in the Standard Theatre tomorrow night. The repertoire will embrace both grand and light opera, "Il Trovatore" being chosen for the opening bill. José Van den Berg will conduct an orchestra of twenty-five and the chorus has been recruited from the chorus singers of the Metropolitan.

In the principal rôles of the Verdi opera will appear Henri Barron, Leon Fastovsky, Bettina Freeman, Eva Quintard, Alan Turner, Gilbert Wilson, Irvin Myers, Hallie de Young, Florence Wallace, and Marie Cressie. Mlle. Orchidee will be the premiere danseuse. The following week "The Mikado" will be sung with Mana Yucca in the rôle of Yum Yum.

In recent years burlesque has undergone a noticeable and commendable change. The best burlesque shows today are almost entirely devoid of the vulgarity that used to be deemed essential to their success. The Columbia Theatre management has done much to bring about this happy condition of affairs, so that the line of demarkation between some of the burlesque entertainments presented there and the less elaborate musical comedy productions of the rest of Broadway is rather indistinct. The Columbia takes special pains with its Summer show, as it is designed to attract the general public. Tomorrow afternoon the Summer production will be made. The Behman company, with Lew Kelly at its head, will be seen in the new entertainment.

A performance of playlets to be given in the Candler Theatre tomorrow afternoon by the Gamut Club will be of special interest, because the program will include Maeterlinck's "The Death of Tintagiles," one of the new numbers of Sarah Bernhardt's repertoire, in which she will appear here in the Fall. The cast will include Hannah Toback, Grace Fisher, Bernice Golden, Olive Oliver, Mary Ward Holton, Anna Tose McIntyre, and John S. O'Brien. "The Courtship of Then, Now, and Tomorrow," a comedy playlet by Anna Wynne, and "Self-Defense," by Anna Moore, will complete the program.

A farce of the race track entitled "777:10," that has been acted with great success in Berlin, Hamburg, and Munich, will be presented Wednesday night in the Irving Place Theatre, by Rudolf Christians and his German stock company. Director Christians will play one of the principal rôles, and others in the cast will be Hertha Schoenfeld, Miss Rub-Foerster, Iffl Engel, Aranka Eben, Flora Arndt, Richard Feist, Heinrich Matthaes, Ernst Robert, Christian Rub, and Otto Meyer.

This will be the last week of the engagement of the Zuro Grand Opera Company in the People's Theatre. The repertoire for the week will be: Monday night, "Lucia"; Tuesday, "Aida"; Wednesday and Saturday, "Carmen"; Thursday, "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci"; Friday, "Masked Ball"; Saturday matinée, "Traviata."

HOW TO PICK A POPULAR PLAY

By ARTHUR HOPKINS

Among the younger producers of plays none has shown more imagination in his choice of subjects than Arthur Hopkins. It was he who produced Eleanor Gates's fanciful drama, "The Poor Little Rich Girl," two seasons ago, while this season he picked the most novel and successful play of the year, Elmer Reisenstein's "On Trial." In the following article Mr. Hopkins points out some of the difficulties that confront the producer in trying to solve his eternal question of what the public wants, explains the system by which he chooses manuscripts, and makes a few pointed observations on the playgoing public itself.

THERE is probably no less scientific activity in modern business than play reading. Why many plays are produced, and why others are rejected, seems an unanswerable enigma. No producer can tell, except in the vaguest generalities, what he seeks in plays. Some are so bold as to state what sort of play the public wants and what sort it doesn't, though the past history of great successes would go far to indicate that the public has not the slightest idea what it wants until it sees it.

It may be generally agreed that the public will not be bored, though it is easy for a producer to make a mistake as to what will or will not bore the public. Of course, the simplest forms of entertainment are the farce with continuous action or the melodrama with many situations. As an author departs from farce to comedy, seeking to make his action more logical, his characters more reasonable, and his dialogue more thoughtful, he hazards being a bore. If he can largely dispense with physical action and give general mental and emotional stimulation through active dialogue, he then has entered the plane of the better dramatists, and in the end may be a Shaw or a Schnitzler.

In the same way, the author who can dispense with the artificialities of melodrama and still construct natural situations of great dramatic appeal, built upon logical recognisable human conflicts, has left the primary grade of dramatist and may reach the heights of a Strindberg or a Sudermann.

Agreed that the public will not be bored, we come to the next proposition, which is that the public likes something new. I think this is more true of the American theatre-going public than of the European. In a city so overcrowded with theatres as New York, plays are quickly forgotten, unless they have some feature that lifts them above the others, something to talk about that sticks in the auditor's mind and crops out occasionally in his conversation.

It is sad to relate, but it is undeniably a fact, there is very little intelligent discussion of the theatre in America. The most superficial matters, such as the leading lady's husband or the amount of the author's royalties, relegate to the background all of the really interesting affairs connected with the present-day change of drama and the theatre. Perhaps this unfortunate and exasperating superficiality on the part of the public is the fault of the managers. Whatever the cause, it is there and must be reckoned with; so the producer who seeks to have his plays talked about will try to find a novel phase, which is easy of gasp and discussion, and there is a chance that the deplorably superficial chatter about the theatre will talk him into a success.

This all seems rather sordid, and it is. But the sordid views will hold until some means is found of developing a theatre-going public that really loves the theatre and understands good drama—a public that will liberally support a fine play like Alice Brown's "Children of Earth"—to my mind the best play written by an American since Eugene Walter's "The Easiest Way"—a public that will not be plunged into such maudlin comments as "Isn't it perfectly bully?" and "Isn't it amazingly naïve?" and "Isn't it a perfect scream?" such as filled a theatre for the last few months when a woman bit actors in the neck—not that they didn't deserve biting—and when a lion turned its head inquiringly—though there was ample ground for his wonderment. And during these amazingly intelligent observations "Children of Earth" was resting in the storehouse, with Winthrop Ames, one of the few idealists among producers, holding his head between his hands and wondering.

But there are many straws which show a wind springing up that will soon bring better things to the theatre. It is a matter of only a short time when America will take its place in the theatre, as it is gradually doing in all the other arts. In the meantime, producers must feel their way or be swept under.

Ordinary plays spell failure—the successes must have talking angles—new treatment, new theme, or especially fine acting, such as that of Ellis Ferguson in "Outcast."

The new idea is the new authors' chance, for new ideas rarely spring from old heads. As this year's great successes have been scored by new authors, so next year's successes will be. Producers must go through all the new material that comes, for there lie the needles in the dramatic haystack. How a producer can intrust his play reading to a hired reader, I am at a loss to understand. It seems to me, the producer's chief service to the theatre and the public is the finding of new plays, the unearthing of new authors. The entire success of the theatre depends upon them. I would rather produce an unknown author's first success than a famous author's last one.

Ideas, ideas, ideas—that is all that is sought. No plays are right when first written. Few plays are anywhere near right. At least, I've not found one, but if they have the idea, they soon can be made right.

Any good producer should be a good collaborator, willing to take off his coat and work many hours with an author who has an idea. It is surprising how rapidly ideas come to an author when he is stimulated by some one who believes in him and will work with him, condemn him, praise him, help him, and gamble on him.

So far as I know, no one has yet evolved any sort of test to which new manuscripts shall be submitted. For my own guidance, I have worked out a crude formula which I have found rather helpful in the past. I have divided the qualities which I consider chiefly desirable into four classifications, viz: Novelty, Human Interest, Acting Opportunity, Production Opportunity. I give them each equal value, viz:

Novelty	25
Human interest	25
Acting opportunity	25
Production opportunity	25
Total	100

Assuming that 100 is a good play, it is then desirable to have your elements add up to a point much higher than 100. Of course, the appraisal of the various qualities is largely guesswork, but, at least, one can arrive at some adjustment. Taking a play like "Within the Law," for instance, the chart would read something as follows:

Novelty (above average)	40
Human interest (above average)	35
Acting opportunity (unusual)	50
Production opportunity (average)	25
Total	145

My estimate of "The Poor Little Rich Girl," before production, was as follows:

Novelty	50
Human interest	50
Acting opportunity	50
Production opportunity	50
Total	200

of "On Trial":

Novelty	90
Human interest	30
Acting opportunity	90
Production opportunity	50
Total	150

of "Evangeline":

Novelty	50
Human interest	25
Acting opportunity	25
Production opportunity	50
Total	150

In this case I erred completely as to the novelty. I believed the visualization of this most widely read of American stories would arouse enough curiosity to prove a novelty. There proved to be none whatsoever, either before or after the opening. I knew the second day of the advance sale and three days before the opening that the production was doomed to failure. The box-office told me.

I again made the same mistake in my charting of "We Are Seven." I believe there was considerable novelty in the first travesty on Eugenics—at that time a widely discussed subject. This phase of the play aroused not the slightest interest.

So, even with charts, we are finally driven to guessing. However, I consider the chart invaluable. I have worked out a number of ramifications which I will not outline here, as they would be rather dull. I am sure this method has pointed out to me many times the fundamental failings of plays, which otherwise might have escaped me.

A new play entitled "The Happy Ending," which I am to produce in October, I have charted as follows:

Novelty	60
Human interest	50
Acting opportunity	40
Production opportunity	60
Total	210

You may check me up on this next Fall, I hope I am right.

THE LONDON STAGE

AS interesting as any item in the chronicle of the Spring season in London is that which records the abrupt and unexpected withdrawal from the Prince of Wales's of "He Didn't Want to Do It," the farce by George Broadhurst and Walter Hackett, of which such glowing reports were sent over following its first production a few weeks ago.

"The piece had an excellent send-off," reports The Daily Telegraph, "but its decreasing hold upon the public is only a further proof that the 'spoof' play, however it may be favored in America, is not destined to enduring popularity."

So they call the "Seven Keys to Baldpate" type a "spoof" play. And they don't like it. Aside from this, it seems that Joseph Coyne was wanted for the "Watch Your Step" engagement at the Empire.

"David Copperfield" stayed at His Majesty's from the Christmas holidays until mid-April, when it was followed by a two weeks' revival of "Oliver Twist," with Sir Herbert Tree appearing once again as Fagin and with Lyn Harding and Constance Collier as Bill and Nancy, the rôles they had when the Dickens melodrama was last played in New York. Last Tuesday Sir Herbert produced "The Right to Kill."

Of the thirty entertainments listed in the London amusement calendar, a full dozen are plays already familiar to those who have done their theatregoing on Broadway. To these, "On Trial" and "The Argyle Case" were recently added. "Excuse Me" was not favorably received, and "Seven Days" fell very flat indeed, according to all reports. "Potash and Perlmutter" and "Peg o' My Heart," of course, continue.

Incidentally, there has been a new play by J. Hartley Manners, the author of "Peg" and the husband of Miss Taylor. "The Panorama of Youth" is the title, and it had the advantage of a cast including Sir George Alexander, Madge Titheradge, and Owen Nares. But it was not received in kindly fashion by the London critics. "It all left us quite cold," says The Times, and The Post expresses the fear that Sir George has gone to much pains for little purpose. "The play may best be briefly described as 'The Second Mrs. Tanqueray,' arranged for the use of schools." At a recent benefit matinée, Miss Taylor appeared in Mr. Manners's "Happiness," the best of the playlets she gave last season on special occasions at the Court.

Nor was much enthusiasm accorded to "Advertisement," the latest play by B. Macdonald Hastings, author of "The New Sin," seemingly it is a sort of "Tonio Bungay" for the stage.

There are star casts and star casts, but seldom is one so distinguished assembled as that which gave the benefit performance recently at Drury Lane for the American Women's War Relief Fund. The play was a "Masque of War and Peace," written by Louis N. Parker. Here is the cast:

MINUTE VISITS IN THE WINGS

MRS. ALMA HANLON KINGSLEY, wife of Walter J. Kingsley, general press representative of the United Booking Offices, has answered the call of the stage, a call which came naturally to her since for many generations the Hanlons have been associated with the theatre. Mrs. Kingsley, who takes her maiden name for professional purposes, has been engaged as leading woman by Pathe Frères.

For many years Mrs. Kingsley's mother, Mrs. Helena Reynolds Hanlon, was leading woman at the Gaiety Theatre, London. The Hanlons have long been known as pantomimists, such famous productions as "Superba," "Fantasma," "Humpty Dumpty," and "Beauty and the Beast" being theirs.

Alma Hanlon is abundantly endowed with the type of beauty that makes for success in the movies. She has what is known in the studio as pictorial beauty, which for screen purposes is considered the most effective.

TRY this on your table d'hôte vocabulary. It is a rhapsody on Elsie Janis, written by Dario Nicodemi, the French dramatist whose play, "The Shadow," was acted here recently by Ethel Barrymore. Mr. Nicodemi was also one of the co-authors of John Drew's play, "The Prodigal Husband," though this should not discourage readers from trying their correspondence-school French on what he has to say about our own Little Elsie, who is repeating her great triumph of last year in the Palace Theatre, London. Writes Mr. Nicodemi:

L'Elégance et l'Originalité ont eu envie de dire un dernier mot et, ensemble, ont prononcé le nom d'Elsie Janis. Mais, avant de parler de cette gracieuse personne il convient de dire quelques mots sur la puissance et l'étendue de son succès. Son nom est magique, à Londres, depuis quatre mois. L'Etranger qui arrive dans la cité "vaste agitée et monotone" de Thackeray n'en entend point d'autre; le grave portier de l'hôtel ne lui recommande ni une pièce en vogue, ni un théâtre à la mode; il lui dit simplement: Elsie Janis. Dans le monde l'engouement pour la jeune Américaine est indescriptible; les jeunes Miss rêvent du mariage qu'elle fera et dont, succès et gloire seront parrain et marraine. On parle des Ducs disponibles. Après Edna May, Gabrielle Rey, Olive May, Lily Elsy qui, toutes allèrent de la scène aux plus somptueux mariages, on attend maintenant le tour d'Elsie Janis. On l'admire, on la jalouse, on l'acclame. Elle a vingt deux ans! D'aucuns m'ont affirmé que jamais Londres n'a été ni aussi unanime ni aussi enthousiaste dans le consécration d'un succès.

Je n'ai pas exagéré en disant que l'élégance et l'originalité étaient les déesses tutélaires de la jeune actrice. Aucune phrase, aucune image ne sauraient donner l'impression de légèreté de ce corps long et mince, ni de la grâce ailée de ses attitudes. Peu de virtuosité classique dans ses danses, mais une fantaisie incomparable, la folle joie du mouvement, l'enchantement, d'une ligne infiniment changeante et toujours harmonieuse. C'est l'impressionisme de la danse.

Et lorsque Elsie Janis chante le charme s'accentue encore. Elle dit à merveille, d'une si claire et pudique ingénuité qu'on n'en saurait parler sans la gâter un peu. Son visage délicat et fin, et ses yeux aux regards interminables, s'y prêtent. J'imagine qu'Anna Judic en sa jeunesse chantait ainsi. Mais, où la triomphante Américaine fait ressortir sa personnalité avec le plus charmant génie et un sens irrésistible du comique, c'est dans les travestis et les imitations, deux genres qui m'avaient été, jusqu'à présent, particulièrement odieux.

MRS. A. M. PALMER went to see "A Celebrated Case" the other night. Mrs. Palmer is the widow of the manager who first produced the play in New York in January of 1878 in the Union Square Theatre, and the performance at the Empire was the first time she had seen the play acted since the night of its American premiere.

Thomas F. Shea, business manager of the Empire, made the first draft of the melodrama in long hand. After the performance Mr. Shea took Mrs. Palmer behind the scenes, where she met the players. She told them that play productions today not only scenically but in the matter of acting were vastly superior to anything put upon the stage a quarter of a century ago.

"Naturalness, fine poise and amazing conviction," she said, "has superseded what was then so fondly and carelessly referred to as histrionism which often meant bombast rhetoric and artificiality. They were fine, large-souled, wonderfully intelligent people, the actors of those days, but love their memories as we may, we have to admit they had not the extraordinary capacity for effecting real illusion of scene such as is accomplished night by night by the actors of today."

The Hot Dogs Are Snapping.

Palisades Park on the Hudson opened for the Summer yesterday with a blare of bands and a display of new attractions. The claim is made that everything to amuse will be found in the park, including the ocean, a small portion of which is pumped daily into a large bathing pool a hundred feet above the river.

Program of Classic Dances.

Teresa Cerutti and some of her pupils will give a program of ancient Greek and Egyptian dances Friday afternoon in the Bandbox Theatre.

TOPPING THE VAUDEVILLE BILLS.

PALACE THEATRE—Gertrude Hoffmann and company in a song and dance revue, in which Miss Hoffmann gives imitations and original dance conceptions; Brice and King in songs and dances; Emma Dunn and company in "The Baby," a comedy playlet by John Stokes; Leon Rothier, Metropolitan baritone, in a program of operatic selections, with Lina Coen at the piano.

PROCTOR'S FIFTH AVENUE—George East and company in a dancing act; an acrobatic performance by the Royal Morocco Arabs; a new Chaplin comedy film.

CHARLES KING'S histrionic ambitions were born when he was an office boy in the employ of William A. Brady some ten years ago. Mr. King used to contemplate the actors who poured endlessly in and out of the Brady offices, and they seemed to him such a carefree lot he determined to become one himself.

He got a job singing from the gallery to the soubrette in a vaudeville act, and he was so pleased with his efforts that he organized the team of Higgins and King for an appearance amateur night in Miner's Bowery Theatre. Mr. King's mother made suits for the boys and they practiced some songs and dances. Their act was so good that they not only won the gold watch offered as the first prize, but a contract to play a year in one of the Miner burlesque shows. The Higgins of the team was Tom Higgins, now a vaudeville actor.

At the end of that year Mr. King and his sister, Nellie, went into vaudeville with a singing and dancing act.

ELIZABETH BRICE was appearing in "The Mimic World" in the Casino seven or eight years ago. Miss King had been on the stage a number of years, her most important engagement being as understudy to Grace Van Studdiford in "The Red Feather." Mr. King was also a member of "The Mimic World" company, and at the close of their engagement in the musical comedy the vaudeville team of Brice and King was formed. Except for the interval of a season when Miss Brice appeared in "Tantalizing Tommy" and Mr. King in "The Little Millionaire" the two have been together ever since in musical comedy or vaudeville.

THE MOVIE HERE TO MAKE THE SPOKEN DRAMA BEHAVE

So Says Daniel Frohman, Who Believes That the Popularity of the Motion Picture Has Already Reached Its Zenith.

THE appearance of the movies on the amusement horizon and their swift rise to the position of a serious rival to the legitimate drama has been the most important development of the last decade in the mimic world. Some years ago when the building of new theatres suddenly became the favorite outdoor sport of the managers, Daniel Frohman, then one of the most experienced managers and producers, saw the handwriting on the wall and predicted desperate days ahead for the drama. Mr. Frohman proved his faith in his own prophecy by leasing the Lyceum Theatre and retiring temporarily from the producing field.

He did not care to be inactive so he applied his skill and experience to the making of moving-pictures, and as Director of the Famous Players Film Company became one of the pioneers of the high-grade photo-drama. Mr. Frohman has never lost his interest in the acted drama and he has already announced his intention of producing plays in the Lyceum again next season. His experience and proved skill as a producer of both screen and stage drama qualify him to analyze their interrelationship and to outline possible further developments in the newer art of the cinema. Here is the analysis he made recently of the screen situation.

The rapid development of the motion-picture industry has brought it to a condition analogous to that of the legitimate theatre some years ago. The reports of vast sums made in the business has attracted outside capital and there are now numerous purely speculative, wildcat concerns cropping up with no other purpose than to fleece the gullible public. The method of these companies is to put on a few pictures, sell their stock, and let the devil take the hindmost investor and any of the others who aren't lucky.

Among the ranks of the honest firms an alignment similar to that pertaining in the legitimate theatre is working itself out. Gradually the producing companies are developing individual specialties till one company makes only features pictures on a large scale; another confines itself to comedy films, another to photoplays. Some of the larger producers, of course, have departments for all of these. Among legitimate producers we find a similar division, different producers specializing in musical comedy, serious drama, or farce and comedy.

The picture theatres themselves are rapidly being classified so that the public recognizes the different houses as identified with certain program types. The advent of the big theatre, of which the Strand is the best known, has done much to elevate the standard of entertainment offered by eliminating entirely the dull show and the cheaper-grade theatre. For when people can see the best pictures amid palatial surroundings as cheaply as in unattractive and insanitary holes-in-the-wall they naturally choose the former.

The producers will soon face the problem of the legitimate managers—that of securing proper material for their cameras. Till now they have had the world and the literature of the ages to draw on, but this storehouse is rapidly being exhausted. When it is gone new sources will have to be developed and new authors trained. Their success will depend upon the skill of the scenario writers in giving fresh treatment to old themes and subjects, just as the modern dramatist succeeds or fails according to the degree of new life he gives to the dry bones of the drama. For the material of the dramatist consists of the world-old emotions of the race.

The moving picture is now at the zenith of its power. Its public is at its maximum, for practically the world and his wife goes to the movies. When one theatre alone entertains 10,000 people a day, as does the Strand, and even the smallest village on the plains has its movie house, it is evident there can be little growth in the size of the daily audience.

So the problem of the cinema is not to increase its public, but to hold it. This it will do by perfecting still further its already marvelous art. The synchronizing of sound with motion on the screen, a device by which the explanatory matter now printed on the film may be spoken so that the picture will not be interrupted, the reproduction of color, and the giving of a stereoscopic quality to the pictures are improvements on which many men are at work and which eventually must come.

But the moving picture raised to the nth degree of perfection can never completely supplant the spoken drama. This is because, while sound and motion may be synchronized eventually so the figures on the screen will give every appearance of speaking, that human quality we call personality can never be completely translated by the lens and transmitted to the audience through the medium of the screen. Only the presence of the living player can communicate the player's magnetism to the audience.

So the mission of the movie is as a corrective to the drama of flesh and blood. It has come to make the legitimate stage behave. When plays are good, people will go to them, as the half dozen theatres that have been crowded all season prove. When plays are bad, people will go to the movies, as scores of half-filled or empty playhouses on the one hand, and crowded movie houses on the other, prove as clearly.

ALAS FOR BURLESQUE!

In this extract from his preface to "The Theatre of Ideas," a burlesque allegory recently published by the George H. Doran Company, the English dramatist tells why he has never ventured to write a burlesque for the English stage.

By HENRY ARTHUR JONES.

OF the productions of the late Victorian stage, Gilbert's burlesques were, if not the greatest, yet certainly the most charming, the nearest to perfection, on the whole perhaps the most satisfying. But Gilbert never dared to smite the great vices and insincerities of his time. Perhaps he was not aware that they existed. He would not have been successful in the theatre if he had attacked them. So he merely scratched at small social and political foibles and infirmities, and he remains a delightful dilettante in satire. A measure of Gilbert's views and aims is given in the fact that he never allowed a word or an idea to stray into Savoy opera that could give his young lady of 16 a hint that she was not a large wax doll. It is not a complete view of human life which proclaims that we are all large wax dolls. If we wish to take Gilbert for a great satirist, a great burlesque writer, we must not mention Aristophanes, Rabelais, Swift, Butler of Hudibras, Butler of Erehwon, or Lord Byron.

I have long cherished three hopes for myself which I fear will never be realized—to stop a night at Dijon on my way southward and drink a bottle of old Burgundy at the Cloche Hotel—to get a week's leisure to read Hooker's "Ecclesiastical Polity"—and to write a burlesque for the English stage.

What a jolly, riotous, instructive art burlesque might be on the English and American stage! What a roaring feast of healthy laughter it might provide for our citizens! Comedy pricks us with a rapier through our correct conventional every-day dress. Irony kisses us on the cheek while it slyly stabs us under the fifth rib. Burlesque strips us bare to the skin, and then lays on with bludgeons and clubs and nine-tails, while it romps and shouts around us. Comedy can best deal with knaveries and follies and vices and shams as they are shown in individuals. Burlesque can best deal with knaveries and follies and vices and shams as they are shown in communities.

How many falsities and solemn fooleries and hypocrisies rankly flourish in English and American life, and call loudly for the reckless, boisterous whacks and thumps that only burlesque can administer!

Every discerning American who visited England in the ten years preceding the war must, I am sure, have been struck with the immense possibilities that English life offered to the burlesque writer. But in place of genuine burlesque we had the witless banalities and sniggering indecencies of musical comedy, supported as it was by all that was powerful and fashionable in the press and in society. We trust that war will cleanse away many of our English falsities and fooleries and hypocrisies. But burlesque would have been much cheaper and more amusing—though perhaps not so effective or permanent.

If I had followed my natural bent I should have planned "The Theatre of Ideas," within a succinct framework, and written it as a play. But what dramatist today, with any knowledge of what burlesque is, would be so foolish as to produce a burlesque of national and municipal follies and knaveries and shams, with the certainty of thereby damaging his reputation with playgoers and ruining his manager? I have therefore thrown "The Theatre of Ideas" into narrative form.

J. MONTGOMERY FLAGG A MOVIE HERO

ALL of the episodes attendant upon the making of a motion picture are not recorded on the film. In the photographing of every movie there are countless little happenings which, if they are caught by the camera, are carefully expurgated by the director with his shears when he edits the picture.

"Runaway June," a Reliance film serial now being shown in more than 3,000 theatres, is in thirty reels and in photographing it there were more than the usual number of amusing sidelights. In one of the studio scenes showing the lobby of a hotel a clerk was needed. James Montgomery Flagg, the artist, chanced to be in the building and he was drafted for the rôle. Mr. Flagg had not acted for pictures before, but, being a versatile young man never averse to showing his own handsome face either in his sketches or in public, he assumed the part with the assurance of a veteran. So the steinbloch Mr. Flagg and his famous sophomore hair are seen in the picture.

The scenario called for many busy New York corners in the auto chase. The result was that the difficulties of the directors were greatly increased. The chase is from Grand Central Station, up Fifth Avenue and through the Park to Riverside Drive. It was easy enough to run autos past such corners as Forty-second Street and Fifth Avenue, but those who have seen the film observe how naturally the policemen held up the pursuers and allow June's auto to slip through the traffic lines. These policemen were not players, but were the policemen regularly stationed at these posts, who were drilled by the Reliance's directors. Each of the policemen who figured in the picture received from $5 to $10 for a few moments' acting. To use cameras at these congested points proved the real difficulty. The camera man could not work in the centre of the street, and he could not work upon the sidewalk. So the cameras were placed in covered wagons with aperatures for the lenses.

The auto work was highly dangerous at times, particularly when the machine was driven off a steep bank and allowed to turn over. But the company got through it without other than minor injuries.

The real adventures began when the company went to the Bermudas. In one scene Norma Phillips was working along a rocky shore. The scenario placed her upon a rock which was rapidly becoming submerged by the tide. After Miss Phillips had been filmed other scenes were made along the rocky inlet. The Directors in the company had entirely forgotten the star in their enthusiasm over these other scenes. When they left her she was standing in water up to her knees; when they finally happened to think of her they found her standing pluckily on the rock, the water up to her waist.

They asked her why she had not called for help.

"I knew the scenario called again for me in fifteen or twenty minutes, and I felt sure that you would remember me then," she answered.

Another scene called for considerable fighting in the water on the part of the men. To make the pictures more realistic they shouted to one another and uttered various battle-cries. Arthur Donaldson could swim but little. After a time he was in serious danger of sinking. His appeals for help, however, went unregarded in the general stress of the water battle, as his fellow-players regarded them simply as a part of the proceeding. It was not until the scene was over and the actors were climbing into a boat that they noted Donaldson did not swim to the boat.

"Why don't you come along?" some one shouted.

"I can't, I'm just about sinking," Donaldson returned.

They hauled him aboard very quickly after that.

WHEN EAST MEETS WEST.

CUSTOMS are different in Kapurthala. One night last week the Maharaja of Kapurthala, his wife, Princess Prem Kaur, and their son, Prince Karimjit Singh, were members of a theatre party for a performance of "Watch Your Step." The party occupied a box, and it was noticed that when the curtain fell at the end of each act the Prince and another young man of the party sprang to their feet and remained standing during the entr'acte like soldiers at attention. None of the rest of the party stood, and as soon as the orchestra returned to the pit the young men resumed their seats.

During the performance Frank Tinney addressed his joke about the thirst born of seeing some one leaning on the rail of a box to the Maharaja's party. He chanced to catch the Princess resting her arm on the box rail, and, looking at her, said: "Please don't lean on the bar, you make me thirsty."

In Kapurthala the comedian would no doubt have been led forth at sunrise and shot or fobidden to mention the name of his — motor during the rest of his life for his impertinence. But being outside his own domain the dusky ruler only showed his pearly teeth in an expression not a smile, while the Princess's face remained immobile.

PROSPECT THEATRE — Pat Rooney and Marian Bent in their offering, "Twenty Minutes of Pat and Marion"; Jack Ryan and Harry Tierney, in a singing act; Claire Rochester in a program of songs, and Joseph Jefferson and company in "Poor Old Jim."

SPREAD OF "HONOR SYSTEM."

123 Colleges and Universities Are Using it Now in This Country.

Students of 123 universities and colleges of the United States are under the honor system, according to a bulletin just issued by the United States Bureau of Education. Of these 37 per cent. are situated east of the Mississippi and south of Mason and Dixon's line; 4 per cent. are in New England; only some 6 per cent. are women's institutions, and 65 per cent. are co-educational.

While the University of Virginia has almost universally been credited with being the originator of the honor system, the bulletin shows that priority is claimed by William and Mary College in Virginia. This institution is declared to have had an honor system in a certain form as far back as 1779 and to have introduced it through its graduates into the University of Virginia. The honor of establishing the system has also been claimed for the University of South Carolina.

Among the institutions of this country that have the honor system in one or all departments are Princeton, Cornell, Barnard College, Washington and Lee University, Smith College, University of North Carolina, Stevens Institute of Technology, Swarthmore College, Beloit College, Wesleyan University, and the Randolph-Macon Woman's College of Lynchburg, Va. Among those reported as having it "in spirit but not in form" are Albion College, Michigan; Dickinson College, Pennsylvania; Bryn Mawr College, Pennsylvania; Mount Holyoke College, Massachusetts, and Rose Polytechnic Institute, Indiana.

"There are institutions where peculiar conditions militate against the adoption of the honor system," says Dr. Baldwin, compiler of the bulletin. Theological seminaries and certain military schools are cited in this connection. St. Joseph's Seminary, St. Joseph, Mo., reports that "the naturally good character aspiring for the priesthood does not require the honor system." Again, in certain military institutions a "breach of honor is considered so serious an offense as to have definite penalties already provided," and no honor system is deemed necessary.

Some institutions frankly oppose the honor system. Among these are Brown University, Ohio University, Vassar College, Bowdoin College, Clark College, Goucher College and Trinity College, Durham, N. C. The President of Clark College declares that "to ask a student to sign a pledge that he has not cheated if an examination is like asking a reputable man to hang up a sign in his store that he does not use short weights."

A few institutions are mentioned as having tried the honor system and declared it a failure. Among these are Franklin and Marshall College, Lancaster, Penn.; the State University of Iowa, Iowa City, and William Jewell College, Liberty, Mo. The bulletin gives as types of consitutions for the conduct of honor systems those of Princeton and Cornell Universities.

Miss Kingston's Last Performance.

In the Neighborhood Playhouse tonight Gertrude Kingston will give the last of a series of performances of G. B. Shaw's comedy "Captain Brassbound's Conversion." The play was written for Ellen Terry, and, after her retirement from the stage, Miss Kingston was the only actress Shaw would permit to play it.

CURRENT NEWS AND NOTES OF THE AUTOMOBILE WORLD

ADVISE MECHANICAL TEST FOR ALL MOTOR VEHICLES

Technical Committee of Safety First Society Makes Broad Recommendation—Acting Mayor's View—Impractical, Says R. H. Johnston.

At the instigation of the Safety First Society of this city an examination has been made of the automobile which caused the death of Karl Bitter, the sculptor, by the Automobile Technical Committee of the society, working in conjunction with Assistant District Attorney J. Ward Folette. As a result of the investigation of the automobile in question, an antiquated car owned by Edgar K. James of 416 Madison Avenue, the committee, composed of George H. Robertson, Chairman; David Beecroft, and Joseph Tracy, has recommended that the Police Commissioner appoint a board of automobile examiners to test the mechanical fitness of motor vehicles to be operated in the streets.

The committee in its report described the automobile which ran into Mr. Bitter on Broadway on the evening of April 9 as follows:

"It is a Buick runabout of obsolete model, date of manufacture and model number unknown to your committee. It has a two-cylinder, double-opposed horizontal motor in front, double-chain drive, and apparently has been remodeled since it was built. A noticeable feature was the manner in which the two individual seats were located upon the rear of the body, the driver's seat being altogether too close to the steering wheel for safe operation and control of the emergency brake lever.

"It is equipped with steel-studded tires on both the front and rear left wheels and smooth-tread tires on both the front and rear right wheels, the rear right tire having been worn to the fabric. The automobile has a wheel base of 81 inches and weighs as follows: Empty, 1,240 pounds; weight over front axle, 740 pounds; weight over rear axle, 680 pounds."

Driven at fifteen miles an hour, the committee found that the car could not be stopped, with both brakes set and the rear wheels locked and sliding, short of thirty-seven and one-half feet. Its four findings from the investigation and test and its recommendation, in full, were:

"Because of the peculiar construction of the car, it was impossible to manipulate the steering wheel and emergency brake at the same time.

"The foot brakes were inadequate, owing to the impossibility of complete application because the movement of the brake pedal was restricted, due to improper adjustment of the brake rods.

"The emergency brakes were adequate.

"Owing to the unequal balance or weight distribution over front and rear axles, it was absolutely impossible to control the operation and stoppage of the automobile."

"As a result of the examination of this automobile, your committee would recommend that the Police Commissioner appoint a board of automobile examiners, composed of experienced automobile engineers and operators, to examine the mechanical details of motor vehicles, which are essential factors of the safe operation of same."

When an expression of opinion on the proposal to have a board of examiners established was sought from George McAneny, Acting Mayor, yesterday, he said:

"The circumstances attending the death of Karl Bitter—the time and place at which the accident happened, the fact that it happened under bright lights in a crowded thoroughfare, and the high esteem in which the victim was held by the entire community—serve to drive home to us with peculiar force the need for stricter control of automobile traffic.

"For years the State and the city, with authority divided between them, have been stumbling along in the effort to afford adequate protection for pedestrians. The State issues licenses for cars and chauffeurs, but it does not enforce strict standards either in the mechanical quality of the automobiles of the skill of those who drive them. The city issues licenses for certain kinds of cars, such as taxicabs, and requires the drivers of these vehicles to measure up to a proper standard of skill; but it does not exercise any control over the vast majority of either automobiles or chauffeurs.

"Thus there is a hiatus in Governmental control. The task now ahead of us is to close this up—to subject every man or woman who drives an automobile to strict regulation, and at the same time allow on our streets no automobile that does not reach a high mechanical standard.

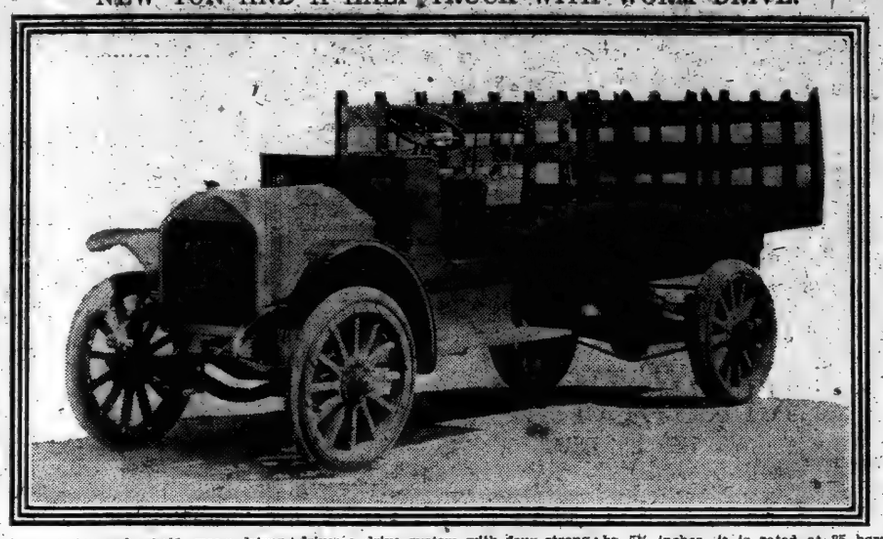
"I am not prepared to say now exactly what form I think the control should take—whether there should be some new commission or department or whether existing agencies should be intrusted with the regulation. I incline to the opinion, however, that the city, as far as its own territory is concerned, should fill all the gaps left by the State, and that, following the enactment of a proper ordinance by the Board of Aldermen, either the Department of Licenses or the Police Department, or both acting together, could meet the demands of the situation."

R. H. Johnston, President of the Automobile Dealers' Association of this city, said that he believed the committee's suggestion to be impracticable. He pointed out that with a thorough inspection of each car once a year—which he believed to be entirely inadequate for the purpose—a force of about forty Inspectors would be required, whereas if the inspection were quarterly, as in the case of taxicabs, about 120 Inspectors would be required.

"I do not believe in general laws to cover specific cases," said Mr. Johnston, "and I do not believe in adding to the already overheavy burden of the taxpayers by creating a force of Inspectors such as is proposed here. Moreover, they would not accomplish the desired purpose. How about the cars coming into Greater New York from Yonkers, Mount Vernon, New Rochelle, or a dozen other near-by cities and towns? They would be subject to no inspection under this proposal, and unless the inspection were complete and thorough it would defeat its own ends.

"The law at present makes it mandatory to have adequate brakes. I am heartily in favor of such a provision, but I think a special inspection of all cars to be quite unnecessary. The car which was in this most regrettable accident was of exceptional construction. I do not believe there are 100 cars out of the 45,000 or so in the city which have the majority of weight over the front axle. Moreover, the rebuilding of the body and seats had made the proper use of the brakes impossible. To create a large board of Inspectors, with their necessary superiors and office machinery, at a cost to the city of perhaps $300,000 a year, to meet such exceptional cases as this would be absurd, it seems to me. Finally, it would not safeguard the public from the out-of-town machine."

NEW TON AND A HALF TRUCK WITH WORM DRIVE.



A new ton-and-a-half worm-driven Garford, shown above, is being shipped to purchasers. Shipments of this one model alone are now going forward at the rate of from three to five a day. Although the motor is placed under the hood, instead of under the cab, as in the heavy-duty models, the curved steel dash with inset lights is still retained, as are many construction features of this make.

The points which receive first attention are the full floating rear axle, embodying the latest practice in worm drive; a drive system with four strong universal joints, and an oiling system combining both splash and force feed. Regular equipment is right-hand drive, although left drive can be furnished.

The frame is of pressed steel, hot riveted, and has a channel section reinforced with cross members and gusset plates. There is space back of the driver's seat for bodies of all capacities and designs suited for loads within the carrying capacity of the truck. The chassis complete, with full equipment and driver's seat with cushions, one seat having its back hinged to facilitate entrance to body, retails for $1,800. The motor, with four en bloc cylinders, 3⅝ by 5½ inches, it is rated at 35 horse power. The valves are fully inclosed on the right side of the motor, all gas passages being inside of the main cylinder casting.

The crank case is an aluminium casting of good proportion. The oil base and gear case are also of aluminium. Except for the fan and the magneto drive, no moving parts are exposed. The fly wheel is inclosed in the crank case, which is attached to the clutch housing, which in turn incloses the multiple dry disk clutch. Ignition is by high tension magneto. The carburetor is of the Rayfield automatic float feed type, hot water jacketed.

INTEREST IN ORPHANS' DAY.

Contributions Received from Distant Cities—Plans for Outing.

That Orphans' Automobile Day, which originated in New York City in 1904, has become known throughout the country cannot better be exemplified than through the fact that last week S. S. Toback, Chairman of the Finance Committee of the Orphans' Automobile Day Association, which conducts the outing each year, received cash contributions from persons residing in St. Augustine, Fla.; Seattle, Wash.; Salt Lake City, Utah, and other distant cities.

This year's outing, at Donnelly's Grove, College Point, on June 3, bids fair to be the largest ever conducted by the association. Working in conjunction with the association in preparing entertainment for the children are several officials connected with the Department of Parks Recreation Bureau, of which William J. Lee is Supervisor. Mr. Lee and his staff of assistants are planning a program of games for both the boys and girls who will participate in the outing. Thus far twenty-two institutions have applied to the association to take their wards on the outing.

To Discuss Speed Governors.

Two papers on the much-mooted topic of automatically governing the speeds of motor vehicles will be presented at the May meeting of the Metropolitan Section of the Society of Automobile Engineers, to be held at the Automobile Club of America May 20. Theodore Douglas will speak on "Governing the Speed of Motor Trucks," and Frank H. Trego on "Governing Gas Engine Speeds."

Anticipated Use of Motors in War.

Six years ago the Automobile Association of England transported a battalion of the Guards at war strength, with full equipment, ammunition, machine guns, &c., from London to Hastings and back again, in order to prove the utility of motor transport for military purposes. The great majority of those who took part in these peace manoeuvres are now doing the work in actual warfare. Time has indeed changed the opinions of the scoffers of that early effort. The Germans took a great interest in it at the time, and reproduced, not only a map of the route in most of their newspapers, but the positions of the imaginary invading troops, destroyed railways, the battlefield, and other details.

EQUAL BRAKE ACTION IS VERY IMPORTANT

Its Lack Will Cause Uneven Tire Wear, Says Brokaw—Some Common Causes.

Motorists who find that one rear tire is more worn than the other would do well to investigate the adjustment of their brakes, according to H. Clifford Brokaw, Principal of West Side Y. M. C. A. Automobile School, Eighth Avenue and Fifty-seventh Street.

"If the brake band on the left side of the car, for instance," said Mr. Brokaw, last week, "grips tighter than the band on the right side, the left wheel will do most of the work of stopping the car, causing that tire to drag. Frequently one band will not hold at all and as a result the opposite tire gets all the stress.

"Even on cars provided with equalizing bars, which are designed to distribute the braking power evenly on both wheels, there is a danger of excessive tire wear. Much of this is due to grease accumulating on the brake band on the right-hand side. Driving as we do on the right-hand side of the road, the car is thrown slightly to that side because of the 'crown' of the road. Grease escaping from the differential housing then gets on to the right-hand brake band and, no matter how well the equalizing bar may be working, the grease on the band lets that wheel slip, while the band on the left side grips tightly, thus throwing all the strain on the left-hand tire.

"It sometimes happens, also, even with an equalizing bar, that one side will be linked up too tight. One wheel will sometimes lock and slide along the street while the other runs free. The tire on the side that locks is then very quickly worn out. If either rear tire shows more wear than the other it would be well to investigate the brakes."

Motor Cycle Race to Coast Planned.

A transcontinental dispatch race by relays of motor cycles over the Lincoln Highway is being planned for July. President Wilson will by asked to start the relay from the army post at Governors Island; it will end at the Presidio, San Francisco. The aid of the War Department is expected.

—and now we wish we had made more—

Indeed we DO!

Twice as many Sixes wouldn't have been too many.

For here in Detroit, at the Studebaker plants, watching the wires coming from dealers begging for more Sixes, it just seems like every man who wants a Six—wants a Studebaker.

Over a year ago, when the 1915 SIX had been finally approved, we arranged to manufacture all the Sixes that we thought we would be able to sell.

Rumors of war and all that. Business prophets talking "hard times," too. But we went ahead and started manufacturing a lot more Sixes than we built the year before.

For this Studebaker SIX always has been one of the fastest-selling Sixes on the market. But now, months before the season ends, we wish we had built more. For there's going to be a shortage—and a BIG shortage of Studebaker Sixes this year. And the man who wants a Studebaker Six had better see his local dealer AT ONCE.

It is a mighty attractive car. Long and massive in looks—low-lying but graceful in every line and finished as mighty few cars are finished.

And then, too, this SIX has MADE GOOD. It isn't in the experimental stages. It was the FIRST Six ever built to sell at less than $2,000—and it has been on the roads, in use in 20,000 owners' hands for THREE YEARS now—longer than any of the other Sixes that followed it down from the high prices. So Studebaker has had experience that other manufacturers won't have had for a year or two to come.

The remarkable balance of the car, its silent and velvety motor, its noiseless gears and marvelously EASY-riding qualities—they haven't just "happened." They have all developed thro' the years of study that Studebaker has been able to center on this SIX.

But when you go over this SIX in detail, you'll readily appreciate the reasons for its popularity. And our advice is: if you want one, see your Studebaker Dealer EARLY.

In these days of strenuous price cutting competition among automobile makers it is natural that many resort to a less expensive top material than

Genuine

Pantasote

Therefore all the more credit is due to the manufacturers who are using Pantasote Tops, in spite of the expense, because of the superior service it gives the purchasers of their cars. It is certainly good evidence of the desire to give full value.

When cars of the character of Pierce-Arrow, Locomobile, Marmon, Hudson, Chalmers, etc., are equipping with genuine Pantasote Tops there can't be any question of its superiority—in the matter of perfect shelter, perfect appearance, greatest resistance to weather, use and wear.

The Verdict

—convincingly and overwhelmingly for Goodrich

The B. F. Goodrich Company alone through the daily press of January 31st gave to the consuming public the most sweeping reduction ever made in tire prices. This established the only genuine Fair-List in existence on non-skid tires today.

Goodrich prices were dated February 1st, in ordinary course. Other tires were reduced in prices a few days later and the reduction dated back to February 1st.

Every real price-reduction on tires has followed the lead of Goodrich.

We knew we were right. We knew that the dealers would know it as soon as our plan was put to the test.

Hundreds of dealers who have been dividing their business have notified us that they have decided to sell Goodrich "Fair-Listed" Tires exclusively.

Tire Standards have from the first been set by Goodrich Products.

Goodrich Safety Tread Tires are today, as they have always been, the Standard by which the merits of all Non-Skid Tires are measured.

Only 5% PLUS for the Best Non-Skid

Goodrich Safety Treads give more mileage than our own (or any other) smooth tread tire, at only the 5% more cost to you. Note comparative table of prices on Non-Skid Tires showing other brands that cost from 10% to 90% more than Safety Treads

Goodrich "Fair-Listed" Prices constitute the standard by which the prices of other tires must be judged.

Goodrich Leadership is more firmly established today than it has ever been in the past.

Goodrich Tires are better this year than we have ever been able to make them before.

The clippings reproduced show how the great newspapers, their automobile editors, and the automobile trade journals as well as tire dealers and car owners helped us to carry this "Fair-List" campaign to a successful issue.

You know the superiority of Goodrich Tires. You also know about Goodrich "Fair-Listed" Prices—the prices that have knocked out the padding for the benefit of Tire Buyers. You know, too, that the verdict is overwhelmingly in favor of Goodrich Safety Tread Tires.

ELECTRIC TAXICABS FOR ALL LARGE CITIES SOON

Investigation of This Type of Car Leads Experienced Taxi Operators to Plan Large Installation—Low Maintenance Cost Obtained.

By A. JACKSON MARSHALL,
Secretary Electric Vehicle Association of America.

The fitness of electric taxicabs for city traffic is fast establishing itself in the minds of many taxi and rental service owners. One of the foremost advantages that recommends it is its low operating cost. That it is cheaper to run than either gasoline or horse-drawn vehicles has been proved. Electric current is cheap, while the modern powerful storage battery is wonderfully efficient. Tire expense of an electric is reduced to a minimum, and its simplicity of mechanism eliminates heavy repair bills. This is of vital importance in a business based wholly upon running vehicles for profit and where economy is of more importance than running a private pleasure car as a luxury.

The most extensive application of "electrics" to taxicab service at present occurs in Berlin, where about 600 electric taxicabs are in use. The Germans have approached the subject of transportation and traffic with the same scientific skill that characterizes all their organizations of worldwide industries, and the electric vehicle has been favored by the Germans only after it has been put to the test and answered most thorough requirements.

Probably the best example of electric taxi development in the United States is in Detroit—the home of the gasoline car. There one of the oldest taxicab companies in America is now operating a fleet of 10 "electrics," which is being increased to 70 or more. It was only after much experimentation that this company became convinced that the old-style cab had grave faults, and began a campaign for "better taxis." The first "electric" with which this company experimented showed a mileage of 1,375 in one month, and by the time it had run 12,000 miles it had proved itself beyond a doubt. In all this time this car had not had any accidents or repairs, and had gone through mud and high snow banks and over the roughest kind of pavements. That it was the most popular taxi in the service and was always in demand proved that the public wanted electric taxis, and they got them.

There is now concrete evidence that the next few months will witness an initial installation of electric taxicabs on a large scale in New York. The company responsible for this introduction will shortly thereafter extend its service on a large scale in all the principal cities in this country. The writer had an interview recently with E. P. McDowell of New York, formerly President of the Renault Taxi Service Company and later President of the Motor Taximeter Cab Company. Mr. McDowell has been identified with the rental of cabs for many years and has had experience with both gasoline and horse-drawn vehicles.

"The first taxicabs," he said, "were introduced into the United States from Paris and London about nine years ago, and at the beginning were a great success. They were such a novelty and the rates seemed so low that it was almost impossible to supply the demand. This resulted in the formation of numerous taxicab companies. Very naturally competition became keener and profits smaller, due chiefly to the fact that dead mileage increased. The public had learned gradually to hire a taxi to go from point to point knowing that after paying and dismissing the chauffeur, another cab could easily be procured if desired. They had learned not to pay for waiting time, which had usually been done before.

"A great many taxi companies of the get-rich-quick type sprang up with alluring prospectuses to entice investors, and very soon over forty companies were operating in New York City. However, they existed for only a short time, ending in bankruptcy and losing all the investors' money. The legitimate taxicab companies greatly suffered during this time of instability and speculation, and by 1913 only eight companies were operating out of nearly fifty that were in business in 1911.

"In 1913 the public agitated a movement for cheaper rates and one of the New York papers started a campaign for low rates and abolishment of private taxicab stands in front of hotels, clubs, &c. This was finally accomplished about Aug. 1, 1913, and former private stands were thrown open to the individual or public chauffeur, and the rates were reduced. After one year's trial this has been a decided failure. In the first place, many chauffeurs had been discharged from various companies for dishonesty and bad conduct, and after the city's ordinance had been passed these men bought cheap, second-hand cars and started in business. These very men are today a constant menace to the safety of the public. Not only are the lives of their passengers often endangered—as the police court records will show—but, pedestrians are in just as great danger from the incompetent and reckless driving of many taxicab chauffeurs.

"The rates having been arbitrarily reduced, it was impossible for the taxicab companies to renew their equipments and keep up to their former standards of high-class service, which cost 32 cents per mile. This figure is entirely accurate, as I know from my own experience, having owned and operated the best foreign and domestic gasoline cars for several years.

"From my past experience I have also found that one of the most uncertain expenses in operating the gasoline taxicab is the cost of damage and accident claims. The use of excessive speed by chauffeurs, in streets where traffic is congested, coupled with the carelessness of pedestrians, is a source of many bad accidents in New York.

"A short time ago my attention was called to the fact that Mr. Scriminger of Detroit, perhaps the oldest taxicab operator in this country, was fast discarding his gasoline taxis for electric taxis. This created a great impression on me. I at once started an investigation, with the following results: I became convinced that the only safe and sane cab for city use is the electric taxicab. Its advantages are numerous. I have observed that the 'electric' has by far the lowest operating cost. The cost of current is low, repair expense is marvelously low, and the life of an 'electric' is from ten to fifteen years or more. The electric taxicab maintains a good average speed, running smoothly and silently, without the sudden spurts caused by the whimsical chauffeur. Simplicity and positiveness of control insure instant stopping and there is no lost time in traffic on account of changing gears. The 'electric' starts as quietly as it stops and is well under way before the other cars have 'picked up.'

"Another advantage which should appeal especially to the patrons of taxicabs is the absolute cleanliness of the 'electric.' There is no oil, no engine dirt. There is none of that penetrating gasoline odor and smoke. The passenger is able to sit back comfortably and enjoy his ride without exhaust explosions or grinding of gears. He can converse easily in ordinary conversational tones.

"Not one of the least advantages is to the chauffeur himself. Any operator who has driven a gasoline taxicab through the crowded, congested streets of New York will tell you that it is like getting a vacation to drive an electric taxi. The importance of this ease of operation has a direct bearing on accidents. The over-strained and tired-out chauffeur is much more likely to be involved in accidents than the operator who has not been overtaxed.

"In several months of tests over stiff hills and in city traffic I have maintained an average of 59 miles on a single charge. Experience has shown that the average daily mileage of an active taxicab for a ten-hour day is about 35 miles, well within the capacity of one battery charge. With the charging facilities now available, the electric taxi may be boosted at relatively high current while waiting at stands for calls, which enables it to obtain almost unlimited daily mileage.

"It is interesting to note that some of the large gasoline taxi fleets have only about 65 per cent. of their entire equipment, including taxis waiting at stands, in operation at any one time, while the remaining 35 per cent. are either inactive or in the repair shop. Add to this the fact that gasoline taxis are usually operated only eleven or twelve hours a day, and it will be realized that there is a large amount of inactive investment, which naturally influences the operating costs considerably. It is quite possible to operate the electric taxicab twenty or more hours a day with two shifts of chauffeurs. But this method, although tried in the operation of gasoline taxicabs, has never proved successful.

"I am so positive of the future of the electric taxicab that I have recently been successful in interesting a number of prominent owners of gasoline equipments in a company about to be formed. These men are just as enthusiastic as I am over the prospects of introducing the electric taxi on an extensive scale. We are assured that this system will eventually become national in scope and our plan is to have an electric taxi and rental service agency in every large city in every State of the Union.

"I have been experimenting with several makes of electric vehicles for the past few months and I am agreeably surprised to find that they can be operated for something in excess of 20 per cent. less cost than a gasoline car. They are well constructed and there is continuous improvement in design and speed. They are much lighter in weight than formerly. A lower rate of insurance is a thing that will further reflect the economy of operation. Insurance companies will be compelled to give justifiable, preferential rates."

In various recent tests which the writer has observed the electric taxi proves its ability to pass through the most congested parts of New York with far greater ease than the average gasoline taxi. On Fifth Avenue, where traffic regulations demand constant stopping, the performance of the "electric" was admirable. It responded readily to the driver's touch and started as quietly and easily as it stopped, picking up and getting under way in remarkably short time.

TO OPEN TOUR SEASON IN NEW ENGLAND

Annual Meeting of Three A's in Boston Expected to Act as Start of Heavy Travel.

New England is looking forward to an increased number of road visitors despite the fact that this year the call of the Pacific Coast is being really recognized for the first time. In entertaining the annual meeting of the Board of Directors of the American Automobile Association, May 17 and 18, Boston will signalize what might be considered an official opening of the road season in New England.

Lewis R. Speare, formerly President of the A. A. A. and the present head of the Massachusetts State Association, has arranged for a local committee, of which Chester I. Campbell is the Chairman. This committee will take in hand the historic ride over the route once followed by Paul Revere, which will take place on the morning of the second day, with moving-picture accompaniment, in order that the event may be reproduced in the Three A clubs throughout the country.

NEWS AND NOTES OF THE AUTOMOBILE TRADE

As a measure of efficiency of an automobile, the May "how far on one gallon" demonstration by Packard dealers in every part of the United States and many points in Canada proved that the gasoline tank was a pulse of the car. Final reports from the 137 participants show the grand average to be 22.1 miles per gallon of gasoline. A few years ago such a record for six-cylinder cars was undreamed of. The high record of the demonstration, secured at New Haven, Conn., under the official supervision of Professors Lockwood and Prentice of Yale University, was fifty-five miles on one gallon.

W. H. Yule, branch manager of the B. F. Goodrich Company, told last week of the results of the "fair-list" issued by that concern. "Haggling has been done away with," he said. "People who purchase tires now can have the satisfaction of knowing that they pay exactly the same prices that their friends and neighbors will have to pay. It is no longer possible for Brown to buy his tires for less than Jones will be charged. Both find it possible to buy tires for much less than they were obliged to pay before the announcement of the 'fair-list,' no matter what kind they select. Not the least of the benefits derived from this method of dealing is to be found in the fact that the tire purchaser is relieved of the necessity of shopping around and wasting time in his efforts to satisfy himself that he is getting an honest price."

As a step in its policy of selling only at wholesale, the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company announces simultaneously the discontinuance of its retail store at 1,972 Broadway and the opening of a service station at 207 West Fiftieth Street instead. This will be conducted for the convenience of the New York City trade, to insure quick delivery of automobile and truck tires. The business in Greater New York will continue under the direction of F. W. Smith, present branch manager, with the general oversight of J. W. Hobbs, New York district manager.

The Times Square Auto Company has arranged to have built in Detroit 10,000 light cars called the Mecca, the first of which is now here. The car sells for $695, and is a thirty horse power, five-passenger machine, low hung, and weighing 1,800 pounds. It is fully equipped.

Block & Landrup, at Copenhagen, handling such cars as the Rolls-Royce, Berliet, and Sunbeam, have added the Scripps-Booth to their line. They have requested that twenty of the latter cars be sent across as their opening order for the 1915 season.

"Just why," said Frank Carrie, manager of the Marmon branch in this city, yesterday, "our New York car should have nearly doubled the record of the Chicago car in the recent mileage test under crowded traffic conditions, making more frequent stops, is puzzling the mechanical experts. The two most plausible reasons I can think of are, first, a better carburetor adjustment on the New York car, and, secondly, that traffic conditions are probably handled better in this city. While the stops of the New York car were more frequent, the stops were of shorter duration than in Chicago, thanks to the more efficient handling of traffic on New York City's streets."

The Republic Rubber Company, manufacturer of "staggard tread" tires, announces that arrangements were recently made with Harold H. Wilcox and M. R. Clodio to handle these tires in Newark, under the trade name of Republic Tire Agency, 64 Halsey Street.

H. C. Bradfield of Indianapolis is now associated with the King Motor Car Company of Detroit, manufacturer of eight and four cylinder automobiles. His special duties will be to keep in close touch with the dealers.

Announcement is made of the removal of Pullman Sales Company, Eastern distributor for Pullman motor cars, to the southeast corner of Broadway and Fifty-fourth Street. A new service station has been established at 1,700 Broadway.

A unique device used on all Inter-State cars is a webbing between the body and the frame to eliminate squeaking and creaking when the car receives strains and road twists.

The Reo Motor Car Company has sent to the laboratory of Columbia University a four-cylinder chassis, which will be used by that institution for analytical purposes.

The tread of this tire is impregnated with strips of rubberised canvas, and rubber between the canvas binds the tread together and prevents it from splitting, peeling off, or coming apart like other tires. It takes more than 1,500 miles of road service to wear off one layer. Count the many thousand miles you can run. Each layer is a non-skid—no chains are necessary. Don't buy any tires until you have examined this tire. Write for free booklet, telling many other important features and money proposition.

NEW YORK—Westchester County.

A Spring Morning Afoot

It was good to be alive. A liquid-throated robin called me early in the morning and I went forth to welcome the Spring!

I followed the winding roadway out from the pretty little village and into the country lanes.

A blue-bird sang a lilting tune to me, the world was in its young-season's gown. New grass in the meadow was showing green, and I leaned over the bank to smile at the brook where Jack had raised his pulpit. The morning breeze was soft and comforting—it was early Spring in Westchester!

The village was Bronxville, and my abiding place was the Hotel Gramatan, in Lawrence Park,—a stone's throw from the pretty station, and yet high above the smooth-running electric trains,—built on the up-ended rocks of rugged character, yet screened by the green of the season.

The Gramatan is exclusive. No hotel in the hill-country is so accessible from New York. Its cuisine is famous, its rooms well-appointed. Here one finds the luxuries of New York mingled with the freedom of the country. The huge foyer is a friendly meeting-place for congenial people.

For the sport lover, golf and tennis are almost at the door; and riding and driving horses, and automobiles are at the call of the guests.

A file of reliable information concerning the HIGHLY RESTRICTED properties in the neighborhood is available for home seekers. A week-end at the Hotel will acquaint you with their advantages.

An illustrated booklet mailed on request.

QUERIES AND ANSWERS

Readers of The Times are particularly requested to read the following before sending queries to the Query Department:

No answers can be given regarding legal or medical matters, card problems, propriety in dress, correctness of English sentences, and values of stamps and coins, nor to questions of a trivial character or of concern only to the questioner.

To receive attention every question must bear the name and address of the person sending it. This does not necessarily mean that the name will be published when the question is answered; only the initials will be used if the questioner so desires. No attention will be paid to queries to which the name and address of the sender are not appended.

Hundreds of letters are received by this department, so that it is obviously impossible to answer all of them immediately. In many cases there must be a certain amount of unavoidable delay.

Dr. Osler's Age Limit.

INQUIRER.—What age did Dr. Osler give as the one at which men should be chloroformed?

Dr. Osler's "two fixed ideas" with regard to age limits and usefulness were, first, "the comparative uselessness of men above 40 years of age," and, second, "the uselessness of men above 60 years of age and the incalculable benefit it would be in commercial, in political, and in professional life if, as a matter of course, men stopped work at this age." He quoted Anthony Trollope's "admirable scheme" by which men of 60 retired for a year of contemplation, after which they were chloroformed. But he did not himself assert that men should be chloroformed at that age, or any other. The words in quotations, above, are from the speech at the Washington's Birthday exercises at Johns Hopkins University, 1905, in which Dr. Osler expressed his opinion as to "age limits."

The Eastern Question.

ISAAC E. REBBI.—In order to settle an argument, I should be grateful for an answer to the following questions: What is the "Oriental Question" and who is really responsible for it? Is there any difference between Ottoman and Turk?

The "Eastern Question" is the expression used in diplomacy from about the time of the Congress of Verona (1822) to comprehend the international problems involved in the decay of the Turkish Empire and its supposed impending dissolution. In other words, it is the "Turkish Question" that is meant by the phrase. It is impossible to place "responsibility" for the existence of the problems involved; the question has its roots far back in the ancient rivalries of Greek and Asiatic ideals; but in the modern sense it dates to the treaty of Kuchuk Kainarji in 1774, which marked the definitive establishment of Russia as a Black Sea power; the treaty of Bucharest, 1812, marked Russia's place as protector of Christians in Turkish dominions. The questions involved in the rise of Japan, the awakening of China, and the interests of Europe and the United States in the Orient are known as the "Far Eastern Question." The Encyclopaedia Britannica, which may be consulted at the Public Library, contains detailed explanation and discussion. An excellent reference book is "The Ancient Question," by Prince Lazarovich Hrebelianovich. "Ottoman" and "Turk" are synonymous terms; the former is the name given to the Turks years ago from the name of their ruler, Othman.

"Peter Pan" at Christmas.

INQUIRER.—Will you please tell me whether "Peter Pan" was produced in London last year at Christmas time?

"Peter Pan" was produced as the children's Christmas play in London as usual, opening Dec. 23.

Passenger Boats to South America.

R. C. V.—Is a steamship company operating at present with a passenger service through the Panama Canal between New York and Chile? If so, is the company American or foreign?

The only passenger service operating through the Panama Canal at present is between New York and San Francisco.

Japanese Immigration.

READER.—Are the Japanese, under the present law, excluded from Panama?

With the purchase of the "Canal Zone" from Panama it was understood that it was not open for settlers, but was to be reserved permanently for the use of the canal. The Treaty of 1911 with Japan made no mention of immigration, but Japan herself agreed, in a statement signed by the Japanese Ambassador at Washington, to prevent its laborers coming to this country.

Count Tolstoy's Prophecy.

T. H. G.—Please quote Count Tolstoy's prophecy that he sent to the Czar in which he prophesied the European war, stating what time he made this prophecy, how long before his death.

Count Tolstoy's prophecy is too long to reprint here. It was published in the Sunday Magazine Section of THE TIMES on Aug. 16. Tolstoy described the Supervenus of Commercialism advancing with her three torches—war, bigotry, and hypocrisy—and the destructive power of commercialism in art, morality, and ideals. The war would break out, he said, in 1912, and would become a catastrophe in 1913; in 1915 a new Napoleon was to appear; about 1925 better religious ideals would bring a change for the better, and victory for the forces of right and idealism would result. He wrote this prophecy in the Autumn of 1910; he died Nov. 19, shortly after the prophecy was written. He was, as a matter of fact, too ill to write it himself, and it was dictated.

Direct Election of Senators.

CAROLYN HOAG.—Will you kindly give me the following information: When was the amendment made to the Constitution choosing Senators by popular vote? What objections were raised to the Legislatures' choice of Senators, as formulated in the Constitution? When was this question first agitated?

The immediate adoption of the Seventeenth Amendment was made possible April 8, 1913, when the Legislature of Connecticut passed the bill ratifying the proposed amendment providing for the election of United States Senators by the direct vote of the people and bringing the number of State legislative votes to the three-fourths required for constitutional amendment. The other States passing the bill were Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Indiana, Illinois, Idaho, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, New York, North Carolina, North Dakota, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New Mexico, Michigan, Missouri, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Vermont, Washington, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming. Proposals for the amendment have been made to Congress for more than sixty years, urging a more direct, representative method of choosing Senators; but it was not until June 24, 1911, that the Senate was induced, for the first time in its history, to give its consent to the change, and the proposed amendment was submitted to the State Legislatures.

Harlem Park Trotting Course.

In reference to the recent query on Mount Morris Park we have received the following from Richard Webber, Vice President of the Harlem Board of Commerce:

Harlem Park Trotting Course lay to the (true) north of Mount Morris and extended from the foot of the hill (inside the present park, about opposite the middle line of the block between 121st and 122d Streets). The most (true) northern point was between 123d and 124th Streets, perhaps one hundred and five feet west of Seventh Avenue.

In shape it might be termed elliptical. The (true) western line was parallel with and about four hundred feet east of Harlem Creek. This line crossed Lenox Avenue between 120th and 121st Streets, and Seventh Avenue just above 122d Street. The (true) eastern line crossed the easterly side of Seventh Avenue between 124th and 125th Streets, touched 125th Street and ran for (roughly) two hundred and sixty feet with the southerly side of that street, crossed the westerly side of Lenox Avenue between 124th and 125th Streets, crossed 124th Street midway between Lenox Avenue and Mount Morris Park West, and crossed the westerly side of the latter between 123d and 124th Streets.

In reading this it must be remembered that our streets and avenues do not run true east and west, or true north and south. Speaking generally, the streets run northeast and southwest and the avenues southeast and northwest. I believe they are a few degrees less than these directions—if I am expressing myself properly.

I have seen this race course mentioned on various maps and in various books, I think, but the only thing I have handy is a "map of the upper part of the Island of Manhattan above Eighty-sixth Street, arranged to illustrate the Battle of Harlem Heights. Lithograph by W. C. Rogers & Co. for Joseph Shannon's Manual [of the Corporation of the City of New York] 1868."

The Belgian Nation.

S. KAHAN.—We have heard of the Belgians' fighting quality. It would be very interesting if you would publish in your widely-read paper some particulars of the Belgian military system, the ordinary habits of the people, the education they give their children, the popular amusements of their country, whether or not they are fond of sport, and whether they give much time to it. All these things would be interesting to know at this time.

The "citizen army" of Belgium is the creation of a law of 1909, under the provisions of which the men who were to be ready to be "called to the colors" in time of war were to be trained as fully equipped soldiers. The term of service, with the passage of the new law, was reduced, but emphasis was laid upon training and the improvement of the physical standard of the army. Belgium, like the other Continental nations, has of course the "conscript" service law. Its peace strength is listed at 42,000 with reserve forces of 180,000, bringing the total war force up to 222,000.

The Belgian people are thrifty, industrious, a "nation of workers," said to be secretive and reserved, self-controlled to the point of stolidity, essentially practical, very proud, very brave. In proportion to its territory and population the commercial activity of Belgium is immense, but its basis of prosperity has always been in the laborious and skillful tillage of the land. Its agriculture made Belgium rich before a mine had been excavated, and it has been to the harvests that the nation has in times past owed its recovery from the ravages of war. The mineral wealth—especially in coal—of the nation is considerable. The system of education in Belgium is simple, comprehensive, and free, and the State gives instruction not only in academic branches, but in such practical matters as cooking, sewing, agriculture, and industry. Primary education continues until the pupil is 12, and is compulsory; secondary education takes the pupil to the entrance of the "superior" or university training. Until the outbreak of the war there were four great universities open in Belgium—Ghent, Liége, Brussels, and Louvain. There were also two special schools for military education—the Ecole Militaire in Brussels and the School of Cadets at Namur—and special schools have existed for the education of the blind and deaf. Belgium is the country of the "Kermesse," and village and community fêtes and fairs have flourished since ancient days among the people. The nation is also very fond of music, and the concert is always the most popular entertainment. Sport has greatly progressed in Belgium in recent years. Sensational progress especially has been made in rowing. Football, hockey, and other "English sports" were introduced about thirty years ago. Swimming is popular, and most of the towns have swimming baths. There are first-rate golf links near Antwerp, and golf is one of the most recently imported sports. As fencers, the Belgians are said to excel all nations except the French, and possibly the Italians. Wild boar hunting and horse racing are popular with those who can afford these sports. The introduction of Swedish gymnastics into the army and the progress of sport in general are, without doubt, responsible for the increased physical force of the army men.

It is impossible to give an adequate account of Belgian life and habits in so small an amount of space as that of the Query Column. This probably answers your questions, and for further information there are several books which can be consulted in the Public Library.

Fuel.

HARRY COLEMAN.—Will you kindly publish an account of the advantage that coal has over wood as a fuel, and also the advantage that wood has over coal?

Anthracite coal, which contains above 90 per cent. of pure carbon, burns with a very small amount of flame, producing intense local heat, and no smoke. It is especially used for drying hops and malt, and in blast furnaces where a high temperature is required, but is not good for reverberatory furnaces. The semi-anthracite coals of South Wales are especially valuable for use in marine steam boilers, as they burn more readily than anthracite and with a larger amount of flame, while giving out a great amount of heat and practically without producing smoke. Coals richer in hydrogen, on the other hand, are more useful for burning in open fires, where a long flame is required. Wood being essentially a flaming fuel, is admirably adapted for use with heat receiving surfaces of large extent, such as locomotive and marine boilers, and has the advantage of being very clean in use. Owing to the large amount of water present, no very high temperatures can be obtained by the direct combustion of wood.

The Iron Cross.

J. L. R., Connecticut.—Will you please give a short history of the origin of the German decoration called "The Iron Cross"?

The Prussian "Iron Cross" is given to officers and soldiers for distinguished service in war. It was founded, in the midst of the enthusiasm of the German war of liberation movement, March 10, 1813, and was revived in the Franco-Prussian war, July 19, 1870. The cross is a Maltese cross of iron edged with silver. The war of liberation crosses (1813-1815) have the initials F. W. (Friedrich Wilhelm) in the centre, a crown in the upper limb of the cross, and the date in the lower. Those of the "war of unity" (1870) have W. (Wilhelm) in the centre, crown and date as in the earlier medal. There are certain distinctions between the Grand Cross, which is worn at the neck, the First Class Cross, which is worn as an order suspended from a ribbon, and the Second Class Cross, which is worn on the breast.

"Deutschland Ueber Alles."

J. L.—Will you kindly print a translation of the German national song, "Deutschland über Alles"?

The translation of "Deutschland über Alles" is as follows:

DEUTSCHLAND, DEUTSCHLAND,
LAND OF ALL LANDS.

Deutschland, Deutschland, land of all lands,
First and foremost in the world,
When thy children face united
Every foe against thee hurled,
From the Meuse unto the Memel,
To the sea, with flags unfurled:

Deutschland, Deutschland, land of all lands,
First and foremost in the world.

German troth and German women,
German wine and German song,
Shall retain their ancient glamour,
Though the years be dark and long.
Noble deeds they shall inspire
In our hearts, and make us strong:

German troth and German women,
German wine and German song.

Brotherhood and right and freedom
Bless thee, German Fatherland,
For this goal we strive together,
One and all, with heart and hand,
For upon these mighty pillars
Evermore thy weal must stand.

Bloom and flourish in that glory,
Flourish, German Fatherland.

The Soldiers at War.

San Francisco Through the Canal.

SUBSCRIBER.—Could you favor me with a list of the steamship lines operating from New York City to San Francisco through the Canal?

The following steamship lines are operating regularly through the Panama Canal: The Luckenbach Company has a boat at fairly regular intervals, carrying first class passengers only, rates $125 up; the American-Hawaiian Line has a sailing about every five weeks, carrying first class passengers only, rates $150; Panama-Pacific Line, which commences operation May 1, carrying first and third class passengers. Further information may, of course, be obtained from the company offices of each line, or from a tourist agency.

American Steamship Lines.

J. L. B.—I am desirous of knowing whether there are any steamship lines carrying passengers and freight sailing from New York or any other port in the United States to European waters that are, and were before the recent act of Congress permitting foreign steamships to come under American registrations, owned and directed by United States citizens. I would also be pleased to know if the steamships St. Paul and Philadelphia are owned by a United States company, doing business under the laws of the United States, which would make it a strictly home-owned company.

The American Line, operating at present between New York and Liverpool, and owning the St. Paul, St. Louis, New York, and Philadelphia, is the only line answering your description, as a steamship line carrying passengers and freight from an American to a European port, owned and directed by United States citizens under the laws of the United States.

Belgian Neutrality.

H. L. M.—What is the correct name and date of the treaty guaranteeing the integrity of Belgium?

The treaty of April 19, 1839, was signed by Prussia, France, England, Austria, and Russia. In it these powers declared themselves guarantors of a treaty concluded on the same day between the King of the Belgians and the King of the Netherlands, providing that "Belgium forms an independent state of perpetual neutrality." It is referred to in diplomatic correspondence as the Treaty of 1830.

Monism.

THOMAS J. O'CONNOR.—Can you inform me where I can secure information regarding advanced monism, which I hear discussed everywhere?

Philosophers at the present day are inclined to despise realism on the ground that its differentiation of body and soul, natural and supernatural, ignores the unity of being. Indeed, in order to oppose this unity of being to the duality of the realists, modern materialists and idealists alike choose rather to write themselves down as monists and describe realists disparagingly as dualists. Those who believe only in body and those who believe only in mind, therefore, can alike be called monists. The following quotation from an encyclopedia gives probably the briefest possible statement of the monist theory and its exponents. For detailed information any of the authorities mentioned may be consulted at the libraries: "Monism is the philosophic view of the world which holds that there is but one form of reality, whether that be spiritual or material. The aim of knowledge is explanation, and the dualism or pluralism which acquiesces in recognizing two or more wholly disparate forms of reality has in so far renounced explanation. To this extent monism is justified; but it becomes mischievous if it prompts us to ignore important differences in facts as they present themselves to our intelligence. All forms of monism, from Plotinus downward, tend to ignore personal individuality and volition and merge all finite existence in the featureless unity of the absolute; this, indeed, is what inspires the passion of the protest against monism. Turning to the historical forms of the theory, we may class Plotinus as a mystical monist; he attains to the One which is the All by an act of mystic union raising him above the phenomenal sphere. Spinoza is a materialistic monist with an inconsistent touch of mysticism, and a certain concession, more apparent than real, to the spiritual side of experience. Hegel's is an intellectualist monism, explaining matter, sensation, personal individuality, and will as forms of thought. The doctrine of Schopenhauer and von Hartmann is a monism of cosmic will which submerges the individual no less completely than Hegelianism, though in a different manner. Haeckel's monism is mere materialism dignified by a higher title. Those who maintain that all these forms of synthesis are hasty and superficial stand by the conviction that the right philosophic attitude is to accept provisionally the main distinctions of common sense, above all the distinction of personal and impersonal; but to press forward to the underlying unity so far as experience and reflection justify." Metaphysics generally recognizes a materialist monism of body, an idealistic monism of soul, and a realistic monism of substance, which is also a dualism of substances.

A Russian Calendar Date.

A TIMES READER.—Will you kindly tell me what the English calendar date was for the Russian date of Nov. 10, 1893?

The English calendar date for the Russian date of Nov. 10, 1893, was Nov. 22, 1893.

Historical Questions.

L. D.—I have been a constant reader of THE TIMES for many years, and notice that the paper answers questions. Will you kindly answer the following for me: What year did the English start war with America? Has the United States had more than two wars with England? Who started the Boer war? What were the atrocities the Belgians committed in the Congo war?

The American Revolution began in 1776. There have been two wars between England and the United States—the American Revolution and the War of 1812.

The Boer war was the outgrowth of friction between the agricultural native population of the Transvaal and the foreigners who came into the country with the discovery of gold; negotiations with England over a franchise right for British residents came to nothing, and both sides determined on war. On Oct. 9, 1899, the Boers sent the British an ultimatum, which the latter refused to consider. Two days later the Boers invaded Natal.

The "atrocities of the Congo" were the crimes and devastations attributed to the treatment of natives in the Belgian Congo, where, although slavery had been prohibited by the Congress of Berlin in 1885, the cruelest forms of enforced labor were said to exist during the exploitation of the African territory by King Leopold, and the first years of the rubber and ivory industries in the Congo Free State. Aug. 18, 1903, the English Government issued a note to the powers, charging that the object of Leopold's administration of the Congo was not so much the care and improvement of the natives as the collection of revenue; that this object was pursued by a system of forced labor, different only in name from slavery; that the demands on each village were exacted with a strictness which constantly degenerated into great cruelty; that the men composing the armed force of the State were in many cases recruited from the most warlike and savage tribes, who not infrequently terrorized over their own officers and maltreated the natives without regard to discipline or fear of punishment. July 23, 1904, King Leopold named a Commission of Inquiry, composed of a Belgian, an Italian, and a Swiss, whose report was published Nov. 5, 1905. The outcry against Leopold's management was at its height in 1906. The King had carried on the Congo industries and Government as his personal affair. With the outcry against his methods he was forced to relinquish his personal claims. The Belgian nation annexed the Congo shortly before Leopold's death.

Jewish Girls in Russia.

P. A.—I will be glad if you will reply to the following questions, as the matter is one in which many readers are interested: Are Jewish girls, not of the first or second-class merchants' guilds, but girls of decent families, allowed to live in Moscow or Petrograd if they wish to live there, or must they apply for the "yellow ticket" and live under the same conditions as a prostitute? I refer to the girls from within the Pale. If Jewish girls of poor families that graduate from high school and are not fortunate enough to be of that percentage which are allowed to enter college wish to have a college education in Moscow or Petrograd, under what conditions could they enter? Must they also apply for the "yellow ticket"? If the "yellow ticket" does not exist, when was it abolished?

Jewish girls, from the Pale, are not allowed to live in Moscow or Petrograd. Jewish girls that graduate from high school are allowed to take their college education in Moscow or Petrograd, and can live there as long as they attend the university. Their entrance is subject to the general laws governing the education of Jews in Russia. As to the "yellow ticket"—which has not been abolished—this is the passport of a prostitute in Russia. No one who is not a prostitute is under any order or necessity for applying for it. There have, however, been cases where Jewish girls, in order to acquire the "right of residence" in Moscow or Petrograd which such a passport gives, registered as prostitutes and obtained "yellow tickets."

Citizenship.

S. L.—Will you kindly tell me whether a child born in the United States is a citizen regardless of whether his parents are naturalized? Would a person born of Chinese parents be eligible to the Presidency of the United States?

A child of alien parents, born in this country, is by the fact of his American birth an American citizen. There is no law qualifying this citizenship for the children of Mongolian parents, although naturalization is denied to Chinamen, and in the strict letter of the law there is no denial of the eligibility of the American-born child of Chinese parents to the Presidency. It is scarcely necessary to point out the impossibility of such a condition. Chinese immigration is, of course, forbidden by law.

W. B. TWINER.—Is a child born of American parents in a foreign country eligible to the Presidency of the United States when he attains the age of 35 years and has lived for fourteen years in the United States?

The child of American parents, born in a foreign country, is considered "native born" by virtue of his parents' citizenship, and is thus eligible to the Presidency of the United States.

Launching of the Arizona.

On Wednesday, May 19, there will be launched at the Navy Yard in Brooklyn the 31,500-ton superdreadnought Arizona, a sister ship of the great Pennsylvania, which was launched at Newport News, Va., a few weeks ago. This new fighting machine will have a main battery of twelve 14-inch guns mounted in four turrets, three guns to a turret, which arrangement represents a new departure in American naval armament.

In addition to her main battery of 14-inch guns the Arizona will also carry a secondary battery of twenty-two 5-inch guns. She will have four 21-inch torpedo tubes. The estimated cost of the Arizona is about $13,000,000, and when in commission she will be manned by about 1,000 officers and enlisted men. She is 600 feet long and is expected to develop a maximum speed of 21.5 knots an hour.

The launching ceremony will be attended by Secretary of the Navy Daniels and a large number of prominent naval officials from Washington, Philadelphia, Boston and other points, as well as by the official representatives of the State and City of New York. It is expected that more than 20,000 persons will be in the Navy Yard when Naval Constructor Bailey gives the command to "saw off."

Miss Esther Ross of Arizona will name the great fighter as she starts on her way to the water.

BOATS FOR VISITORS.

ON boats carrying passengers between warships and the shore, the fare shall not in any case exceed 25 cents each way. The fare out is to be collected upon embarkation of the passengers, and the fare back during the return trip, and no tickets of any sort shall be sold, nor shall return trip fare be collected on the outward passage.

The operators of boats and float permittees will be responsible to the Dockmasters that they continue their service each day until ships which they serve are cleared of visitors, and a failure to fulfill this rule will disqualify them for future operation.

Float permittees of the Park Department or Dock Department will not permit other than boats with a number issued by the Department of Docks and Ferries to use their floats during the visit of naval ships for the purpose of transporting passengers to and from warships or around the warship. The penalty for violation of this rule will be immediate revocation of their permit and removal of the float.

Boats will promptly clear gangways and landing places upon the direction of authorities on the ships and Dockmasters, so that traffic may be conducted as expeditiously as consistent with safety.

The Police Department will prevent the sale of tickets, will keep floats cleared of all except the number of persons who can be accommodated in the launches actually at the float, will keep order on the docks, and will prevent, as far as it is in their power, violations of these rules. All violations shall be promptly reported to the Department of Docks and Ferries.

Steamboat Inspection Service will advise the Department of Docks and Ferries as to the safe carrying capacity of boats whose owners are applying for numbers to enable them to operate, and will have representatives on the floats where crowded conditions are liable and see that no more than the number are carried by the various boats.

FACTS ABOUT THE WARSHIPS

OF the famous fleet that encircled the globe in 1908, under the successive commands of Rear Admirals Evans, Thomas, and Sperry, all of whom are now dead, five are in the column now at anchor in the Hudson. They are the Louisiana, the Kansas, the Georgia, the Virginia, and the Rhode Island. The fleet tender Yankton, then commanded by Lieutenant W. R. Gherardi, now naval attaché in Berlin, also went around the world with the fleet.

The newest vessels in the fleet are the superdreadnoughts New York and Texas and the submarine tender Fulton.

The weight of a 14-inch projectile is 1,400 pounds, which means that a 14-inch broadside from either the New York or the Texas would weigh 14,000 pounds. To fire such a broadside would cost the Government about $7,700.

The submarine motherships Tonopah, Ozark, and Tallhassee were originally named the Nevada, the Arkansas, and the Florida. They all lost their State names so that they might be given to vessels of the superdreadnought type.

To keep a battleship of the Atlantic fleet in commission costs on an average $828,778.78 annually. Of this more than $700,000 is the pay of officers and enlisted men. The rest goes for repairs, equipage, &c.

The annual cost of keeping a submarine in commission is $31,168, of a torpedo boat destroyer $101,333, of a submarine tender $187,473, of a hospital ship $215,424, of a supply ship $172,702, of a monitor $120,390, an armored cruiser $561,013, a second class cruiser $84,215, and a gunboat $107,690.

The pennant of an Admiral shows four stars on a blue field. Those of Rear Admirals two stars on a blue field. The four-starred pennant flying from the Wyoming indicates that the superdreadnought is the fleet flagship of Admiral Fletcher, the commander in chief.

The dreadnoughts Florida and Utah were the two first-line ships that figured most prominently in the capture of Vera Cruz last year. The Florida was Admiral Fletcher's flagship during the first two days' fighting, which ended in the taking of the Mexican port.

The oldest battleship in the Hudson is the Georgia, which was authorized March 3, 1899, and the keel of which was laid Aug. 31, 1901. The Virginia, a sister ship of the Georgia, is the second oldest. The Virginia's keel was laid May 21, 1902. The keel of the Nebraska, the third oldest battleship in the column, which is also a sister ship of the Georgia, was laid July 4, 1902.

The auxiliary cruiser Prairie figured in the Vera Cruz fighting, and with the Chester and the San Francisco, the last named also in the Hudson River column, bombarded the Vera Cruz Naval Academy, from the building of which came the most stubborn of the resistance to the landing of the Americans.

The San Francisco, now a mine-layer, was one of the ships of the old White Squadron. She was authorized by Congress in 1887.

In the fleet now in the river there is a total of twenty 14-inch, one hundred and six 12-inch, fifty-six 8-inch, thirty-six 7-inch, forty-eight 6-inch, one hundred and thirty-three 5-inch, twenty-four 4-inch, and two hundred and thirty-eight 3-inch guns.

The silver services on the battleships in the Hudson are estimated to be worth in excess of $150,000. In each instance the service was presented to the battleship by the people of the State in honor of which the ship is named.

Admiral Fletcher, the Commander in Chief, is a native of Iowa. Rear Admiral Mayo, commanding the First Division, is a Vermonter; Rear Admiral Boush, commanding the Second Division, is from Virginia; Rear Admiral Coffman, commanding the Third Division, is also a Virginian, while Rear Admiral McLean, commanding the Fourth Division, is from New Jersey.

Captain William S. Sims, commanding the torpedo flotilla, was born in Canada, and Commander Yates Stirling, commander of the submarine flotilla, was born in California.

The fuel ship Jupiter is one of the finest vessels in the world of her type. She is electrically propelled.

The little four-funneled, yachtlike vessel from which the steamer of Captain Sims flies is one of the three scout cruisers in the navy. The others, the Chester and the Salem, are not here.

SUBMARINE FLOTILLA.

NO type of naval craft has figured so prominently in the present great conflict in Europe as has the submarine, and for that reason it is safe to say that no ships in the Hudson will attract more attention than the little under-water fighters of the Atlantic submarine flotilla, under Commander Yates Stirling, Jr. Some of these little battleship wreckers have come more than 1,300 miles under their own power in order to appear in the Presidential review—a feat that is in itself a record breaker for vessels of their type.

The submarines in the Hudson number an even dozen and are of the Second, Third, and Fourth Divisions of the flotilla. They represent the best of the D, E, G, and K classes. There are three of the Ds, two of the Es, three of the Gs, and four of the Ks in the Hudson River line-up.

In the First Submarine Division are the three submarines of the D and the two of the E class. The D vessels cost $380,000 each and those of the E class $375,000 each. The commanders of the D vessels are Lieutenant Earle C. Metz, Lieutenant P. K. Robottom, and Lieutenant Rush S. Fay. The two E vessels are commanded by Lieutenant Thomas Withers and Ensign Charles M. Cooke.

In the third division are the three submarines of the G class. G-1 cost $450,000, G-2 cost $410,000, and G-4 $437,500. The commanders in the order named are Lieutenant Joseph M. Deem, Lieutenant Ralph C. Needham, and Lieutenant Ernest D. McWhorter.

The K vessels are the newest and most powerful of the underwater craft in the Hudson. Of the four vessels that are in this division, K-1 and K-2 each cost $469,000, and K-5 and K-6 cost $478,000 each. The commanders are Lieutenant Lucius C. Dunn, Lieutenant Radford Moses, Lieutenant Holbrook Gibson, and Lieutenant Joseph C. Fisher.

The flotilla also includes three mother ships and three tenders, in addition to the flotilla flagship, the auxiliary cruiser Prairie. The mother ships, alongside which the submarines gather at night like chickens, are the monitors Ozark, Tonopah, and Tallahassee, while the tenders are the new Fulton, and the torpedo destroyers Macdonough and Worden.

WITHIN the last few weeks the loaning market for new apartment house operations both in Manhattan and the Bronx has been more favorable from the builders' standpoint than was the case during the greater part of the Fall and Winter. The large loaning institutions have shown a greater readiness since the first of the year to put money out on permanent loans in good localities, and to this fact is evidently due the realty activity in some prominent apartment house centres.

On the west side, below 110th Street, while there has been no great activity, several high-class buildings are now nearing completion for Fall occupancy and others have been planned. West End Avenue has furnished most of the big sales for apartment house improvement. That thoroughfare is rapidly becoming, to the west side, what Park Avenue is in the elegance of its multi-family dwellings to the east side.

It is no easy matter to accumulate a large plot on West End Avenue, for the apartment building movement there has been so active within the last half dozen years that most of the available corners have been removed from the market. The past few months, however, have witnessed some good deals and nearly half a dozen new parcels are under improvement or will be in the near future.

Among the noteworthy operations are the new twelve-story house on the northeast corner of Eighty-fourth Street, just finished by Dr. Charles V. Paterno, and a similar building on the northwest corner of Broadway, covering the entire Eighty-fourth Street frontage between the two avenues. Dr. Paterno recently acquired a big plot on the southwest corner of Eighty-eighth Street for improvement with a big apartment, to cost, with the land, over $1,000,000. On the northwest corner of Eighty-ninth Street, Albert Saxe is erecting, from plans by Emery Roth, a thirteen-story house on a plot 44 by 90, to cost about $250,000, having a single apartment on a floor.

Harry Schiff has just completed a fine apartment on the northeast corner of Ninety-sixth Street. Among recent sales for future improvement have been the northwest and northeast corners of Seventy-fifth and Eightieth Streets, respectively, while on the south side of Eighty-sixth Street, between West End Avenue and Riverside Drive, three big houses are being erected by a syndicate represented by Mullikin & Moller.

On Broadway there has been little building activity outside of the Alameda—the Paterno house on the Eighty-fourth Street corner—and the new operations just started by Jacob Axelrod on the block front on the east side, between Eighty-eighth and Eighty-ninth Streets, where two twelve-story houses, to cost over $1,500,000, will be ready for occupancy in the Fall. On the easterly block, between Eighty-ninth and Ninetieth Streets, contracts have been let for the completion of the big apartment to cost $1,500,000, for which Vincent Astor had plans filed over a year ago.

Another unusual operation is the twenty-story hotel apartment to be known as the Hotel des Artistes, recently started on the north side of Sixty-seventh Street, near Central Park West. It is being erected by a co-operative syndicate of artists and will be the finest building of its kind in the world, the cost exceeding $1,000,000. Edwin A. Browning's four apartment hotels in the Seventy-second Street centre, three of which are nearly completed, are a distinctive feature in that choice residential centre, as each covers a plot of but twenty-five feet, while being thirteen stories in height. For the fourth one, the plot at 31 West Seventy-first Street, purchased a few months ago, has been excavated for the new building.

North of Ninety-sixth Street the busiest centre for new apartments has been the upper Washington Heights section, especially on Fort Washington Avenue and Riverside Drive above 160th Street. Three big six-story houses have been started covering the northeast corner of the Drive and 161st Street, and 300 feet adjoining on the street, to cost over $500,000. The northwest corner of Fort Washington Avenue and 169th Street is also being improved, and eight five-story structures are under way on Haven Avenue, between 178th and 181st Streets, costing nearly $700,000. A big plot, 100 by 128, on the northeast corner of Riverside Drive and 144th Street, was recently acquired by Michael V. Paterno for improvement with a fine thirteen-story building.

On the east side Park Avenue has been the centre of interest in prospective apartment house operations. Some big investment deals have also given a stimulus to the market, including the purchase by William Ziegler, Jr., of the fine house on the southeast corner of Park Avenue and Seventy-second Street, representing over $1,500,000, being the biggest apartment house deal of the season outside of the recent trade for the Chatsworth, at the foot of West Seventy-second Street. Julien T. Davies, a few months ago, bought the new house on the similar corner of Lexington Avenue and Seventy-second Street. Both of these buildings were erected by Edgar A. Levy, and he has just purchased the southeast corner of Park Avenue and Eighty-first Street for a high-class structure which, with the land, will represent an investment of over $1,000,000. In the same vicinity Bing & Bing, who have been very successful and active operators, have bought the northwest corner of Eighty-fourth Street. They also own the southeast corner and it is expected that building operations will begin on both corners in the Fall. The Bings have lately finished a twelve-story house at 955 Park Avenue, adjoining the southeast corner of Eighty-second Street.

One of the finest houses on the avenue and which, although not yet completed, has been over three-fourths rented, and at big prices, is the building at 400 Park Avenue, northwest corner of Fifty-fourth Street. It is being erected by the Fullerton-Weaver Realty Company, which has built some of the best houses on the thoroughfare within the last four years, and every one has been successfully rented. One of their new houses, opened last Fall, on the northwest corner of Sixty-sixth Street, was sold a short time ago for about $1,200,000.

The 400 Park Avenue house is close to the extensive Goelet holdings. The Ogden Goelet estate finished last Fall a large building on the southwest corner of Fifty-fifth Street. Robert W. Goelet, by his recent purchases, now owns the two block fronts on the west side from Fifty-second to Fifty-fourth Street, and recently enlarged his northeast corner of Fifty-fifth Street to a frontage of 125 feet on the avenue by 108.9 feet on the street.

TRADE BARRIER IN BAKER PURCHASE

Choice Murray Hill Block Front Now Secure from Business Invasion.

INVESTMENT A GOOD ONE

Projected Apartment on Old South Church Corner Evidently Abandoned.

One of the most interesting deals of the past week, revealed through the transfer records, was the purchase by George F. Baker of the former Dodge residence on the southwest corner of Madison Avenue and Thirty-ninth Street. Title to the house, the home of the late Miss Grace H. Dodge, was taken in the name of Mr. Baker's daughter, Mrs. William Goadby Loew, while Mr. Baker took title to the stable in the rear, now used for light business.

One feature that makes the sale interesting is that its object was evidently to restrict the encroachment of trade, as its purchase gives the Baker family ownership of the entire westerly block front between Thirty-eighth and Thirty-ninth Streets, their holdings representing an assessed valuation last year of over $1,500,000. The immediate Thirty-eighth Street corner, owned by George F. Baker, Jr., has a frontage of 147.6 feet on the street by 74.4 feet on the avenue, but the former includes the two private residences at 13 and 15 East Thirty-eighth Street.

It was this corner that figured several years ago in one of the largest restrictive purchases in the Murray Hill section. It is just outside the zone covered by the Murray Hill covenant, and in order to prevent the erection of a large apartment it was bought by Mr. Baker, Jr., and remained vacant for three or four years. The original intention was to have the corner improved with private homes, but no one was found to undertake expensive residential operations in a growing business district. The result was a compromise, as shown in the dignified four-story building now on the site, designed for professional offices, and which has been well rented.

Mr. Baker occupies the large house in the middle of the block and adjoining him is the home of Mr. and Mrs. W. Goadby Loew. The next house on the corner was the late Miss Dodge's home, 262 Madison Avenue, 45 feet front, one of the fine residences of that former select home centre.

It is a safe prediction that offers for business uses will eventually be made, and evidently to prevent the erection of a tall commercial structure on a well situated corner close to the busy retail centre of Fifth Avenue, Mr. Baker took the property. The recorded transfers indicate that he got it at a very reasonable figure, the total consideration for the two parcels being $350,000, or a trifle less than $40,000 under the assessed valuation for 1914. Brokers who are familiar with the values and demand for choice parcels in that neighborhood consider that the Baker interests made a very neat investment.

Just above the Baker block the two fine old houses on the southwest corner of Fortieth Street, each fronting 27 feet, will be torn down early in July for the twelve-story building to be erected on a long lease by Mrs. Lillia B. Hyde, the owner of the corner, for the International Correspondence School. About half of the building will be used by the school and the remainder will be leased for business. F. E. Townsend, the architect, filed plans a few days ago. The estimated cost is $285,000, and it will be ready for occupancy in May, 1916. It will mark another radical change in the choice residential section of upper Murray Hill.

Adjoining the southeast corner of Forty-second Street August Heckscher is preparing to erect a big office building, and one of the old Madison Avenue structures covering the site has already been torn down. The handsome Havemeyer residence on the southwest corner of Thirty-eighth Street has been in the market for some time, without any restrictions against trade, as the result of a discovery by the lawyers of the estate a few months ago that the corner was originally sold by the Murray family without restrictions.

The fate of the old South Reformed Church building on the opposite corner, within the restricted zone, remains undecided. The owners of the property who took it with the understanding that it would be freed from any restrictions against an apartment house have apparently, now that the case has been decided in their favor, abandoned the idea of erecting the contemplated apartment. As the old restriction will surely hold good in those blocks for perhaps many years against trade interests, it is hard to predict what would be a remunerative improvement of the old church corner. Meanwhile, according to a sign on the property, the owners are willing to sell.

Sale of Forty-fourth Street Loft.

Herbert A. Sherman has been instructed by Supreme Court Referee Augustine R. McMahon to dispose of the new twelve-story loft building, Nos. 15-17 West Forty-fourth Street, on May 24. The sale is the result of a judgment in foreclosure in favor of Viola Flannery vs. the 15 West Forty-fourth Street Company amounting to $160,000. The prior liens amount to $275,000. It adjoins the St. Nicholas Club and the old Parkside Lyceum.

TO PROTEST STATE TAX.

Mass Meeting at Majestic Hotel Tomorrow Evening.

Members of the Real Estate Protective Association, Inc., and taxpayers in general are being urged to attend a mass meeting to be held under the auspices of the above association Monday evening, in the Hotel Majestic, Central Park West and Seventy-second Street, to "protest against the iniquitous, extraordinary, and unnecessary direct tax measure, now in the hands of the Governor, the signing of which will spell confiscation and fasten upon the taxpayers of New York City, alone, an obligation to pay a sum exceeding $21,000,000."

The notice continues: "History will repeat itself here and show that whenever a direct tax is levied a sum from 25 to 35 per cent. in excess of the amount required will be collected from the taxpayers. A direct tax is invariably levied with the intent and purpose of bringing in enough money to take good care of and to fulfill promises made to the political machine, to provide for extravagant expenditures to carry out schemes and projects.

"Without a doubt, the imposition of this direct tax will cause to be collected, in the entire State, a sum exceeding $30,000,000, 70 per cent. of which will come from New York City. Thus this city, instead of paying, as now erroneously urged, $14,000,000, will be required to pay not less than $21,000,000."

Apartments Leased.

Pease & Elliman have leased, furnished, for Edward Dunn his apartment in 535 Park Avenue, at Sixty-second Street, to Malcolm D. Sloane, also for the Park Avenue Company, controlled by Edgar A. Levy, in the new building under construction at 525 Park Avenue, the southeast corner of Sixty-first Street, an apartment of twelve rooms and four baths to Ernest Hopkinson of the United States Rubber Company.

Douglas L. Elliman & Co. have leased apartments in the new building at 390 Park Avenue, southeast corner of Fifty-fourth Street, to Mrs. Charles E. Wilmot; also in conjunction with J. P. Whiton-Stuart Company to William E. Curtis and Miss Elizabeth Curtis; also in conjunction with Pease & Elliman to Louis M. Greer. This building, which will not open until the Fall, is now about 60 per cent. rented.

DEMAND FOR SMALL FLATS IN LONG ISLAND CITY

The Constantly Growing Army of Workmen in New Industrial Centre Starts a Building Boom That Promises to Break All Records in the Borough.

The growing importance of Long Island City as an industrial centre with its constantly increasing army of workmen has created a demand for small, private dwellings and three and four-room flats that has far exceeded the supply.

Several large plots of land adjacent to the Queensboro Bridge Plaza were sold to builders last week for immediate improvement, and other deals are under way, but it will be months before the supply will be found equal to the demand.

Discussing the situation yesterday William D. Bloodgood of the firm of William D. Bloodgood & Co., said:

"There is a strong and immediate demand here for flats in the modern type of buildings and this demand is not in anticipation of the influx of those now living in Manhattan's too congested tenement districts, but simply to house the workers now employed in the many large industries already located here.

"Strengthening my observation of this scarcity of supply are the statistics recently compiled by manufacturers here who are very anxious to have their employes situated near their work in comfortable quarters. These figures show that, from a total of over twenty-five factories, only 54 per cent. of the employes lived here and the remainder were obliged to make expensive and uncomfortable trips daily.

"In these days of efficiency this is no longer a matter to dismiss as unimportant, but plays a strong part in relation to the employe and his work. An investigation of this astonishing and illogical condition showed the absence of sufficient modern apartment houses to be the cause.

"Apartments here to be suitable must not only give good rooms, light and air, &c., but must be moderate enough in price to be popular with the working class. Land is too high, it is true, in Long Island City to be considered for improvement with one or two-family houses and be within reach. However, viewed for apartment purposes, where four-story buildings housing twenty or twenty-four families can be erected on a plot of ground 50 by 100 feet, it shows a handsome return to the builder, even when the apartments are rented for as low as $13 for three rooms and $16 for four rooms and bath.

"The secret of this is owing to the fact that lots can now be bought in improved streets in Long Island Ci as cheap as $2,000 and $2,500 per lot.

"It would seem that now would be the time for the investors and operators to build while these low prices exist, for it is needless to state that they will not remain long, when lots for similar purposes in Manhattan are bringing three and four times as much, and not nearly so desirable from point of neighborhood.

"The most popular type of flat house is that containing three or four rooms and bath with hot water supply; the tenants heating the apartment at their own cost during the short Winter season, as there is a general aversion among this class of tenants to pay for steam heat that they consider they are not utilizing about eight months of the year. The benefit is mutual; the saving effected by the tenants is reflected in a greater degree to the landlord, who, not alone has saved the installation of an expensive plant and the heavy consumption of coal, but does away with expensive maintenance costs.

"I do not mean by this that steam heated apartments are not desirable, for we have a number located in streets further away from the industrial zone that are highly successful, bringing from $5 to $7 per room, and with waiting lists; however, the building of these houses does not remedy the situation in regard to the great mass of workers here, who are entitled to and should be accomodated, and I feel that the utterance of THE TIMES in bringing to light the facts in this relation, will bear fruit and attract those people who will be quick to recognize Long Island City as a fertile field for this type of operation.

"By this I mean not alone the builder and buyer, but, also that equally important member of the triangle—the lender. Without his assistance, and in spite of the demand, it is impossible to accomplish anything.

"It is gratifying, however, to say that we are steadily finding new funds for this purpose almost daily, the lenders being attracted by the unusual stability that the security offers, realizing the internal strength here without even counting upon the wonderful future that exists for Long Island City on the completion of the transit facilities that will bring us within five minutes' ride of Grand Central or Times Square, with a 5-cent fare over Greater New York's subway systems.

"I have yet to see in Long Island City a flat house offered at foreclosure sale for default in its first mortgage. I do not believe such a case has ever happened."

The feature of the week in the Queens market was the announcement that the American Real Estate Company had purchased a tract of 1,150 lots in the Steinway section and is planning an immediate development of the property. It is the largest deal of the kind of well-situated property close to the Manhattan business centre that has been made in some time, and the entry of the American Real Estate Company as prominent developers of Queens property indicates the great confidence of the operators in the future of that rapidly growng borough.

For the last twenty-five years the buyers have been active developers in Manhattan, Bronx, and Westchester County, and their selection of Queens for building operations on a large scale is certain to exert a marked influence in the realty market there, both from a residential and a business standpoint.

The property purchased comprises the Kouwenhoven estate, situated between Steinway and Fourth Avenues, with frontages on Flushing, Woolsey, Potter, Ditmars, Wolcott, Fourth, Sixth, Seventh, Eighth, and Ninth Avenues. It is a short distance from the East River near Hell Gate, and will be served by various lines of transit, of which the most important is the new Astoria branch of the subway, with a station at Ditmars Avenue, and an express station at Hoyt Avenue within a block of the Flushing Avenue frontage of the property.

The elevated structure of the subway extension is already erected along Second Avenue to the property, and a connection is now being constructed on Jackson Avenue and at the Bridge Plaza. It is expected that trains will be operated through the Steinway Tube by June 15, and that trains over the Queensboro Bridge will be running by the early part of next year.

The American Real Estate Company intends to begin at once the development of the property by erecting apartment houses for employes of neighboring factories and workers in Manhattan. The company proposes to do in Queens what it has done successfully in the Bronx.

E. B. Boynton, President of the company, expresses his belief, as the result of his study of business conditions, that the tide has turned, good times are ahead, and that this is the psychological time to begin constructive action in real estate operation and investment.

Cassidy's Club at Auction.

Joe Cassidy's Democratic Club house in Court Square, Long Island City, will be sold at auction by Henry C. Johnson, Jr., next Tuesday. It is being sold under proceedings instituted by the Long Island City Savings Bank on a mortgage judgment of $12,000 with interest.

Corse Estate to be Liquidated.

On Tuesday, May 11, at noon, in the Exchange Salesroom, 14 Vesey Street, Joseph P. Day will offer at trustee's sale, for the estate of Henry Corse, deceased, the southwest corner of Washington and West Eleventh Streets and the adjoining parcel known as 718 Washington, and 348-350 Washington Street.

TO SPEND $1,100,000.

Important Public Improvements Planned for White Plains.

Definite steps were taken by the Westchester County Board of Supervisors during the past week to spend $1,100,000 for a new addition to the White Plains Court House and for the erection of a county penitentiary and workhouse on the Alexander Smith Cochrane farm, near East View.

The newly created Building Commission, consisting of Robert S. Brewster, Chairman; Arthur V. Lawrence, and George Merts, submitted recommendations to the supervisors regarding the new buildings and they were unanimously approved by the supervisors.

Part of the front of the old Court House will be razed and in the place a new addition of two groups of buildings of granite will be erected to cost about $600,000. It is proposed to demolish the present structure back as far as the County Court room. The Surrogate, District Attorney, and Supreme Court librarian will be forced to vacate while the work is going on. There is now the old County Court building with the new wings adjoining, and when the new group is completed there will be four buildings joined together with the historical old White Plains Court room in the centre. This was built in 1855.

April Building Report.

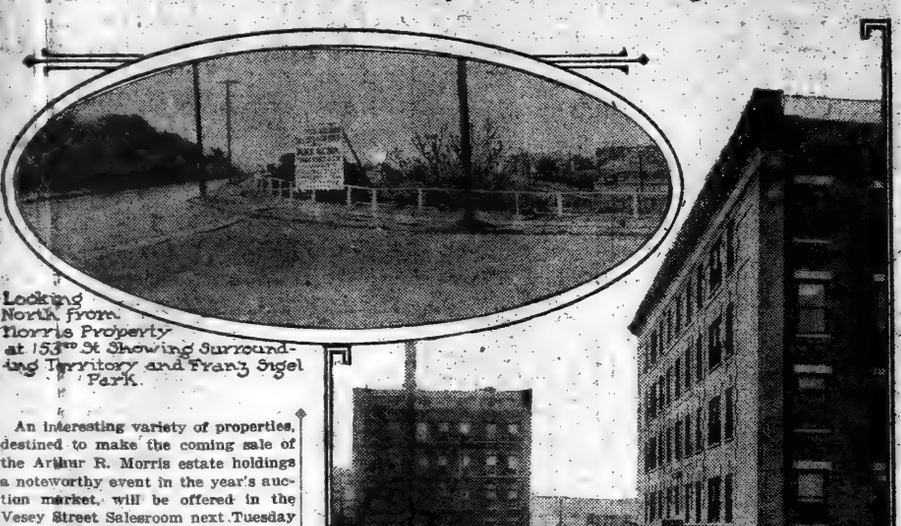
Reports to Bradstreet's Journal as to building show that while the percentages of decrease are being whittled down, current building operations, taking the country as a whole, are still well below corresponding periods of previous years. Reports this week (eighty-four cities reporting) show a total expenditure of $50,004,987 for April, as against $53,366,635 for April a year ago, a decrease of 6.3 per cent.

It will be recalled that in February and March the decreases were in the neighborhood of 12 per cent., and in January the loss from a year ago was 8.3 per cent. In the last quarter of last year, however, the decrease from the like period of 1913 ranged from 13 per cent. in November to 39 per cent. in December. In April this year only twenty-nine out of the eighty-four cities reporting, or about one-third, showed gains.

Building expenditures for four months of the calendar year 1915 aggregate $216,780,605, a decrease of 16 per cent. from a year ago, which in turn lost 11 per cent. from 1913.

CHOICE PARCELS IN AUCTION MARKET

Morris Estate Offering This Week the Largest Individual Sale of the Year—Realty in Four Boroughs.



Looking North from Morris Property at 153rd St Showing Surrounding Territory and Franz Sigel Park

Apartment Houses just North of Morris Prop

An interesting variety of properties, destined to make the coming sale of the Arthur R. Morris estate holdings a noteworthy event in the year's auction market, will be offered in the Vesey Street Salesroom next Tuesday by J. Clarence Davies and Joseph P. Day, the latter being the auctioneer.

Arthur R. Morris was a descendant of Robert Morris of Lancasshire, England, and Pennsylvania, and one of the seigners of the Declaration of Independence. Arthur Morris early became interested in religious matters and in 1871 went as a missionary to Japan, where he lived up to the time of his death.

By his will he directed that his properties be sold and the proceeds be given, among others, to Christ Church of Yokohama, Japan; the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, the Evangelical Education Society, the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, trustees of the fund for the relief of widows and orphans of deceased clergymen, American Church Building Fund, and others.

The properties to be sold reflect the good judgment of Mr. Morris in making investments, and include in Manhattan 402 and 404 Pearl Street, running through to 10 New Bowery, a six-story loft, of which early possession may be obtained, if desired; also 438 and 440 West Fifty-seventh Street, a five-story double apartment house, on lot 50 by 100.

In Brooklyn the properties include 69 to 75 Myrtle Avenue and 327 to 333 Jay Street, a group of three-story business buildings, to be sold as one parcel; 206 to 224 Harrison Street, 301 to 305 Clinton Street, and 10 and 12 Tompkins Place, a group of eighteen three-story private dwellings in an old residential neighborhood. These will be sold separately.

In the Bronx the holdings include the ground occupied by the business building at the northeast corner of Third Avenue and 138th Street, facing in the traffic centre the plaza formed by the junction of Third, Morris, and Lincoln Avenues and 138th Street. The building is owned by the tenant, who holds the land under a lease having eleven years to run, with the privilege of two renewals of twenty-one years each on the basis of reappraisals.

Other properties in the Bronx are the sixty-three lots bounded by 153d Street and 156th Street, Mott and Sheridan Avenues, opposite Franz Sigel Park, within two blocks of the Mott Avenue station on the extension of the Lexington Avenue Subway line. They will be sold separately.

In Queens are the two frame dwellings at 258 and 260 Academy Street, adjacent to the Plaza and the industrial section of Long Island City.

In the opinion of Messrs. Day and Davies this sale will be one of the most attractive offered to the realty buying public during the year. It is the belief that all of the parcels will be picked up at bargain prices, on account of the war times, notwithstanding the fact that they promise early increases in value from the accessibility of their location and proximity to important arteries of rapid transit.

FACTORY FIRE ESCAPES.

Important Decision Just Rendered by Court of Appeals.

The Advisory Council of Real Estate Interests has called to the attention of property owners the recent decision of the Court of Appeals, in the case of Amberg vs. Kinley, whereby it is declared that failure to provide fire escapes, as required by Section 82 of the labor law, establishes a conclusive proof of negligence against such persons not complying with this provision.

The section of the labor law prescribes the following requirements with regard to fire escapes on factories: "Such fire escapes as may be deemed necessary by the Commissioner of Labor shall be provided on the outside of every factory in this State consisting of three or more stories in height."

The property owner possessed a large modern building for drying oiled hides, 123 feet long and 43 feet wide, commonly termed a tannery drying loft. The first floor of this drying loft was of the ground, with only two board floors above, the third story being only sixteen feet from the ground.

Notwithstanding the moderate height of the building the court primarily held that it was three stories high, within the meaning of the labor law. Though tan bark was banked around the building outside to the top story, thereby indicating its low structure, this fact was not regarded of sufficient weight to exclude the building from the operation of the labor law.

There were seven bents in the building and on the second and third floors there were ventilators in each bent. These ventilator openings were 8 feet wide and 3 feet high. Although on a level with the floor they were provided with a pair of shutters fastened at the top on hinges, but they could be easily swung outward at the bottom. However, no fire escapes were provided on the building, the owner not feeling it necessary doubtless, with a building the third floor being but sixteen feet from the ground with seven avenues of escape on the second and third floors through the ventilator openings, 8 by 3 feet.

Two employes were engaged at work in taking the hides soaked with oil out of a wheel barrow on the first floor, loading them on a truck, taking them up by elevator to the top or third floor, and there hanging them on pegs in the beams of the ceiling to dry. One afternoon they took a truck loaded with hides and placed it on the elevator. Then one of the employes left the building and did not return for ten minutes, when he found the loft in flames. It burned very rapidly and was consumed. After the fire the body of the other employe was found among the embers on the ground, under the place where he and his co-employe had been hanging the hides on the third floor before the fire, and the truck was not far from the body. Circumstantial evidence adduced would thus tend to prove that the deceased employe was on the third floor hanging hides at the time of the fire.

The court held that it was not necessary on the part of the representatives of the deceased, in an action of damages against the property owner, to prove that he had negligently caused the death of their testator in order to establish the liability of the property owner. Mere non-compliance with that provision of the labor law requiring fire escapes was sufficient to determine conclusively negligence on the part of the property owner, although the building was provided with stairs, elevators, windows, seven ventilator openings, was steam heated, and there were no stoves in it. Failure to provide a fire escape thus establishes the negligence of a property owner, as a matter of law, even under conditions as stated.

STEINWAY TUNNEL.

An important conference was held Thursday by representatives of the Chamber of Commerce of the Borough of Queens, with officials of the city and the Public Service Commission, to secure immediate action on the proposed connection between the Steinway Tunnel and the Grand Central Subway Station, and also to secure the early operation of the Second Avenue elevated trains across the Queensboro Bridge. The members of the Chamber who were present at this conference represented many millions of dollars of investments in real estate and factories in different parts of the borough.

The meeting was held in the office of Chairman Edward E. McCall of the Public Service Commission. Acting Mayor George McAneny, General Manager Frank T. Hedley of the Interborough Rapid Transit Company, and Chief Engineer Alfred Craven of the Public Service Commission were present, in addition to a committee from the Queens Chamber of Commerce, which included John Adikes, Chairman of the Transit Committee; M. J. Degnon, John J. Kindred, E. A. MacDougall, Stuard Hirschman, Walter I. Willis, and F. R. Howe.

Assurances were given by both Chairman McCall and Acting Mayor McAneny that steps would be taken at once to have the necessary connection built; in order that the thousands of passengers using the Steinway Tunnel daily would not be compelled to walk a distance of 900 feet through the traffic at Forty-second Street, to the nearest entrance of the present subway.

The urgency of starting this work immediately was pointed out by General Manager Hedley of the Interborough Company, who stated that orders had been given to have the Steinway Tunnel ready for the operation of shuttle service by June 15.

When the Steinway Tunnel is finally placed in operation, after almost eight years since its completion in 1907, a storm of protest will come when it is realized that passengers will be carried only as far as Third Avenue and Forty-second Street, and that unless the connection which is proposed by the Queens Chamber of Commerce is built, they will have to walk for the next two or three years, from Third Avenue to Madison Avenue, carrying a transfer that will enable them to continue their ride in the subway. If the connection with the present subway is started now it will be ready by June, 1916, and save eighteen to twenty-four months of inconvenience to the traveling public.

To Sell 400 Jamaica Lots.

An important sale of Jamaica property will be held by the William P. Rae Company on May 29 and 31. It will sell at auction the undeveloped portion of the Jamaica Hillcrest tract, being about 400 of the 1,400 lots acquired for development about four years ago. One of the features will be the ability to buy on the installment plan. One may pay all cash and get a rebate, or may allow 60 per cent. to remain on mortgage for a period of years. The installment plan provides for payments of $5 or $10 a month on each lot.

NATIONAL TAX CONFERENCE.

Experts to Discuss Problems at Annual Gathering in California.

The National Tax Association will hold its ninth annual conference at San Francisco Aug. 10-14, including a joint session with the American Economic Association, which will hold its annual meeting during the same week. The sessions of the conference will be arranged to permit time for delegates to visit the exposition.

The conference is composed of members of the association and official delegates appointed by the Executives of the various States and the Canadian provinces, Presidents of universities, and associations of chartered accountants. Professor E. R. A. Seligman of Columbia University is President, S. T. Howe, Chairman of the Kansas Tax Commission, Vice President, and T. S. Adams of the Wisconsin Tax Commission, Secretary.

Much importance attaches to the conference this year, in view of the widespread and increasing interest shown in the subject of taxation, a feature of which will be the report of the Committee on the Federal Income Tax, of which Professor E. R. A. Seligman is Chairman. Another important report will be that of the Committee on Increase of Public Expenditures, of which Dr. T. S. Adams is Chairman, who will discuss a concise, carefully devised plan for checking waste and introducing economies in fiscal affairs. Judge Oscar Leser of the Maryland Tax Commission will have charge of this session.

Numerous special topics will be discussed, including classification of taxable subjects, efficiency in the collection of taxes, taxation of car companies, tax-limit laws, and valuations of corporations by Public Service Commissions.

The report of a committee on situs of intangible property will present the latest thought on that important subject. The usual review of legislation in the various States by M. M. Flannery of the Federal Trade Bureau will be of particular interest, in view of the large number of legislative sessions held this year.

BUILDING ELEVATED LINE.

Work on Ely Avenue Section in Queens Borough Started.

The work of erecting steel for the Ely Avenue elevated structure of the dual subway system in the Borough of Queens was started last week by Terry & Trench, sub-contractors for the steel work.

A large crowd of persons watched the first steel upright pillar hoisted into place near Nott Avenue by a traveling crane. By evening half a dozen uprights were in place on each side of the street and the cross-sectional girders had been laid across.

It is planned to put up the section of the elevated railroad on Ely Avenue and Davis Street from Nott Avenue to the railroad yards first. Then the structure will be continued north on Ely Avenue to South Jane Street, where it will connect with the approach to the Queensboro Bridge.

The steel work for the connecting link between the Second Avenue "L" and the Plaza has also been begun at Jackson Avenue. A traveling crane has been placed on the completed part of the "L" at the foot of Second Avenue and it is now lifting the steel members into place, working along Jackson Avenue to the Plaza.

LONG BEACH IMPROVEMENTS

Unanimous Approval of Street Expenditure and School Budget.

Several very beneficial improvements are under way at Long Beach, L. I., which will add materially to the attractiveness of that popular resort. As a result of the recent vote authorizing an expenditure of $200,000 for street repair and sewer extensions, about 244,000 square yards of streets, including the laying out of some new sections, will be well paved with macadam or brick, most of the work being of the former material.

This appropriation was voted for by the resident property owners, the only ones qualified to vote on matters of local improvements involving the expenditure of money and the raising of bonds. Of the ninety eligible voters, fifty voted and the decision was unanimous.

John G. Gerhard, President of the Board of Trustees of Long Beach, said that little street work had been done for five years and the expenditure of the money was absolutely necessary. Included in this work is the improvement of the parking spaces along the main boulevard and other localities. The popular boardwalk will also be improved by a concrete paving for the greater part of its three-mile length, this being done by the Estates of Long Beach.

At the recent election a school tax budget of $18,985 was adopted. This, says President Warren E. Burns of the Board of School Trustees, is $5,000 less than last year's budget, making a reduction in taxes from 36 cents to 28 cents per hundred.

"The assessed valuation of the school district," adds Mr. Burns, "is $7,000,000. The number of pupils has been erroneously stated as twenty. There were, however, forty-six pupils registered last year and it is expected that the total registration for the coming year will be over sixty pupils."

SUBWAY ENTRANCES.

Advisory Council Opposes Use of Sidewalks on Nassau and William Streets.

The following resolution has been adopted by the Advisory Council of Real Estate Interests: "The Advisory Council is opposed to the use of the narrow sidewalks on William Street and Nassau Street for subway entrances and exits. Furthermore, it believes that as there will be stations for the William Street route at Fulton Street and Wall Street only, and at the former point the traffic must be handled through entrances on the easterly side of William Street only, entrances 6 feet 6 inches in width or less than 5 feet high net inside measurement, will be insufficient to handle the traffic from Brooklyn as well as upper Manhattan.

"The Advisory Council urges that the question of the width of entrances and exits be given most careful consideration, and entrances adequately provided for.

"Provided no other and better method for handling this situation can be devised, the Advisory Council urges that private property be secured, either by private contract or condemnation, for the purpose required, and that in any event the matter be settled at the earliest possible date, so that proper and economical arrangements can be made for these entrances and exits, while the subway work is being done."

CHANGE IN MORTGAGE LAW.

Relates to Rights of Owners to Require Assignments.

Holders of mortgages and owners of real estate will be interested in Chapter 493 of the Laws of 1915, now signed by the Governor, which relates to the right of owners to require the holders of mortgages to assign them on the demand of the owner of the land.

Walter Lindner, solicitor of the Title Guarantee and Trust Company, in speaking of the amendment, called attention to the fact that under Section 275 of the real property law, as originally passed, if the holder of a first mortgage had made an additional loan which was represented by a junior mortgage or mortgages, or had some other lien against the property, the owner of the land might demand an assignment of the first mortgage and leave the holder with his subordinate mortgages or liens as first liens on the property. In other words, they might be in danger of being cut off if he did not protect his claim on a subsequent foreclosure.

This situation has been met by the new enactment which adds to the section giving the owner the right to have mortgages assigned to his nominee, a provision that the mortgage holder shall not be required to execute and deliver an assignment of his mortgage where he has a junior or subsequent mortgage or other lien on the same property. Under this new provision if an owner desires an assignment in place of a satisfaction of mortgage he must pay off the entire claim of the mortgage holder against the premises.

INVESTMENT vs. SPECULATION

Money put into real estate at LITTLE NECK HILLS, Third Ward, Borough of Queens, NEW YORK CITY, 27 Minutes from Pa. Terminal, is in no sense a risk. It is an investment of the first order, which is as sure to pay handsome profits as if the money were already collected.

With the completion of the Long Island Railroad's connection between Little Neck Hills and New York City, via the Dual Rapid Transit System now under consideration by the city officials, and the inauguration of the FIVE-CENT FARE, property values are sure to advance materially.

Couple this fact with the attractive residence features of this community, and it will be self-evident why you cannot go wrong if you select a plot here, either for investment or home building purposes.

Located at an elevation of two hundred feet, with beautiful shade trees, rambling hills, winding drives, graded streets, water, sidewalks, curbs, electric lights, and every feature which makes suburban life worth while, Little Neck Hills gives every assurance of becoming one of the most popular of the city's home sections.

You can buy a 6, 7 or 8 room bungalow or semi-bungalow, ready for immediate occupancy, from $4,650 to $6,750, (small initial payment,) or you can build one to your order, in either case, you can pay for it with the money you now pay for rent. Write for booklet.

COTTON IS STEADY AT HIGHER LEVEL

Market Opens 4 to 10 Points Up and on Heavy Trading Closes with a Gain of 10 to 15.

ENGLISH DEMAND IS STRONG

Experts Think the Panic Features Due to the Lusitania Tragedy Are Things of the Past.

Whether as a result of support or buying based on the general belief that cotton was cheap around present prices, the market yesterday showed impressive steadiness in view of the panic conditions which prevailed Friday afternoon. The showing of Liverpool had a reassuring effect. The undertone in the English market was steady. Spot cotton was dull. The contract market was 3 to 5 English points higher than due.

The opening here was steady at an advance of 4 to 10 points, and there was heavy trading, with leading interests large buyers. A private cable received from Liverpool said: "Provided that no unfavorable developments occur between the United States and Germany, we have a very favorable opinion of the market."

There was a general disposition among cotton men to believe that no principle of international law was involved which would lead to more than diplomatic exchanges between the United States and Germany. This, of course, was a legal view of the situation and was quite apart from the pronounced feeling of reprobation and horror over the sinking of the Cunarder.

The tragedy was strongly brought home to Cotton Exchange members by the fact that James J. Black of the firm of Richardson & Raili, who had been in America for about two weeks and returned on the Lusitania, was believed to be among the missing. His firm cabled that no word had been received from him, and great anxiety was felt. Mr. Black was among the keenest students of cotton in the Liverpool trade, with a large number of friends both in New York and the South.

The cotton trade is disposed to believe that the panic features of the situation have passed and that the actual cotton outlook has not been affected in any way by the sinking of the Lusitania.

Fall River printcloth sales for the week were 150,000 pieces against 110,000 pieces last year. Trade reports at the week-end are somewhat unsettled owing to the decline in raw cotton.

The weather map yesterday showed good rains over the eastern belt, with 3.68 inches at Atlanta, 2.85 at Macon, and 1.10 at Augusta.

Southern spot markets as officially reported were unchanged to 25 points decline. The local market for spot cotton was quiet, unchanged, 9.85c. for middling upland. The range of contract prices was as follows, (closed steady:)

There was some upturn in flour prices here during the week, in spite of the easing off in wheat, Winter patent advancing to $7.60 a barrel and Spring clear moving up to $7. The only decline in the major provisions at Chicago was shown on live hogs. Mess pork was steady and unchanged, while the rest of the items advanced. Bacon advanced here. The shortage of supplies affected some of the dairy products, notably butter and cheese, to the extent of advancing prices, while too heavy receipts of eggs had the effect of forcing prices down.

There was not much change in the price position of the fresh and dried fruit markets, and what change there was was upward. The same held true of vegetables. There was general weakness in spices, and, while the principal grades of raw sugar declined, there was no change in standard granulated. Teas and coffees were unchanged. In the grain market there were declines in wheat, corn, oats, and malting barley, while advances were shown on rye and timothy hay.

One of the chief features of the week's changes was the general decline in the domestic wools, the only grades not showing a decline being coarse Wisconsin and Illinois. Cotton also broke quite sharply under the influence of events beyond the control of American interests. Burlaps went up on both the light and heavy goods under the scarcity of spot supplies and the excellent demand for them. Spot jute declined, and while fair Manila hemp, spot, went down, spot midway advanced.

From all accounts, the metals markets took on a firmer tone during the week, concessions being difficult to obtain. Prices on refined iron bars at Philadelphia moved upward, and in the minor metals a decline in tin was offset by advances in antimony and spelter. No. 1 kip was the only grade of hides to show a decline, while advances were recorded on No. 1, native packer; No. 1, Texas; heavy native cows and branded cows. Leather showed no change.

Drugs, chemicals, dyestuffs and oils together showed twenty-three changes, of which twelve were upward. None was very important. The remaining changes were divided between an advance and a decline in the point market and an advance in the price of the best Chinese raw silk.

WHEAT.

The very bearish Government report of Friday, in connection with the Lusitania disaster, had a very depressing effect on the wheat market Saturday, and closing prices, which with the exception of July were around lowest of the day, represented a net loss of 2¾@4½c per bushel.

Cash wheat here was weak, with No. 2 red quoted at $1.60½ and No. 2 hard winter at $1.62½, cost, insurance, and freight on track; No. 1 Northern, Duluth, $1.58½, and No. 1 Northern, Manitoba, $1.62, cost, insurance, and freight, Buffalo.

CORN.

With weather conditions very favorable over the belt for the completion of corn planting, that market shared the wheat heaviness on Saturday and closed ¾ to ⅞c net lower. Broomhall reported that there was an improved demand at Liverpool, with Plate offers very light and American offers free. No. 2 yellow here was quoted at 85¼c prompt shipment.

PROVISIONS.

Following the grain markets, provisions were weak and lower on Saturday with a fair business, including considerable liquidation and commission house pressure. On the decline packers bought lard and ribs, but this failed to permanently check the break, and final prices were around the lowest of the day.

COTTONSEED OIL.

An irregular market prevailed in cottonseed oil on Saturday, near months being 2 to 9 points lower, while more distant deliveries closed 2 to 4 points net higher. The weakness in near positions was influenced by a poor spot demand and lower lard prices.

COFFEE.

The coffee market was lower yesterday, under scattered selling, which appeared to be most generally attributed to the unsettling influence of Friday's developments. The opening was 5 to 11 points lower, and active months sold about 8 to 15 points under Friday's closing figures during the middle of the morning. Slight rallies followed on some positions, with the close showing a net loss of 6 to 17 points.

BUTTER AND EGG MARKET.

BUTTER.—Receipts yesterday, 4,866 packages. Quite a sharp demand for high-grade fresh creamery, and the stock was absorbed as fast as it was unloaded. Prices were firmly maintained, but receivers made no effort to advance values, feeling that we are right on the eve of very much larger supplies. Creamery, extras, (92 score,) 31c; higher scoring, 31½@32c; firsts, 29@30½c; seconds, 27@28½c; thirds, 24@26c; creamery, held, firsts, 26½@27½c; seconds, 25@26c; thirds, 23@24c; State dairy, finest, 30@30½c; good to prime, 28@29c; common to fair, 23@27c; renovated, extras, 23½@24c; firsts, 22½@23c; lower grades, 20½@21½c; imitation creamery, firsts, 22@22½c; ladles, current make, firsts, 21½@22c; seconds, 20½@21c; lower grades, 19@20c; packing stock, current make, No. 2, 20c; lower grades, 18@19½c.

EGGS.—Receipts yesterday, 12,295 cases. The market is closing fairly firm on the highest grades of fresh stock showing a good proportion of full, stong bodied eggs. Qualities are running rather poorer than usual at this season, and medium and undergrades are of very irregular value, with only a moderate demand. The sales reported are chiefly in the range of previous quotations. Storage room is getting scarce, and a good many dealers are unable to take care of stock arriving intended for storage. Dirties and checks are firm in the very highest grades, but much of the supply is more or less defective and having very irregular value. Nearby white eggs in large supply, and while a moderate proportion of the finest goods is worked out at top quotations, a large part of the supply has no outlet above a range of 22@23c. Fresh gathered, extras, per dozen, 22½@23c; storage packed, extra firsts, 21½@22c; storage packed, firsts, 20½@21½c; regular packed, extra firsts, 21@21½c; regular packed, firsts, 19½@20½c; seconds, 17½@19c; thirds and poorer, 17@17½c; storage packed, dirties, No. 1, 17½@18c; fresh, dirties, No. 1, 17¼@17½c; No. 2 and poorer, 15½@17c; checks, good to prime, dry, 16@16½c; culls and inferior checks, 10@15c; State, Pennsylvania and nearby, hennery whites, fine to fancy, 23@23½c; defective, 22@22½c; gathered whites, as to size and quality, 21½@22½c; Western, gathered whites, 21@22c; State, Pennsylvania, and nearby, hennery browns, 22@23c; gathered brown and mixed colors, 20@21½c; duck eggs, State and nearby, Indian Runner, 25@27c; Baltimore, per dozen, 22@24c; Western, 20@22c; Tennessee and other Southern, 19@21c.

CONSOLIDATED EXCHANGE.

Following an opening rush of selling, the market on the Consolidated Stock Exchange rallied well. There was evidence that strong supporting orders had been placed and that also many "bargain hunters" had been attracted to Wall Street by the big break in prices on the news of the torpedoing of the Lusitania. Trading was active, although not on as heavy a scale as Friday, with commission houses handling a good volume of orders which included a great number of transactions in odd lots.

BOSTON COPPER GOSSIP.

Old Dominion Produced 1,338,000 Pounds Last Month.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, May 8.—The local office of Mass Consolidated has this week received a telegram from the mine Superintendent, saying that the diamond drill struck water in the old Evergreen mine and that the new No. 8 lode continues to "look fine." The drill referred to is located on the sixth level west from B shaft, and has been drilling up through the lode in an endeavor to strike the old Evergreen openings so as to drain them.

The April output of Old Dominion was 1,338,000 pounds of copper, which compares with 603,000 pounds in March and with 2,779,000 pounds in April last year. Hancock's April output is estimated at better than 110,000 pounds. More than 400 tons of rock are going to the Franklin mill daily. April production of the Lake Superior mines is estimated at 20,000,000 pounds. Wolverine's output for April was 456 tons of mineral, against 415 in March. This is the largest output since June, 1914.

EAGER DEMAND FOR BONDS.

Pennsylvania Issue Goes Fast in Spite of Lusitania Tragedy.

The offering of $65,000,000 4½ per cent. general mortgage bonds of the Pennsylvania Railroad has not been seriously interfered with by the break in the market on the Lusitania's loss, it was said yesterday. Up to 2 o'clock Friday, when the news arrived, subscriptions were being received at a very rapid rate. It was at first feared the depression caused by the tragedy would delay the sale, but the subscriptions were coming in yesterday morning at a rate which led the bankers to believe that the books would be closed tomorrow. The date set for expiration of the offer was May 11.

Kuhn, Loeb & Co. are managing the syndicate, which embraces a large number of bond distributing houses.

Good Apple Crop Aspects.

Reports from all apple producing sections of the country, except the Northwest, says The Fruit Trade Journal and Produce Record, indicate that there is a prolific bloom on every variety, and that the outlook points to a large yield this year. Advices from Western New York state that many localities will have fully as many Baldwins as last year, and all signs point to a much heavier yield of greenings. Advices from the Northwest are somewhat conflicting. The crop there, according to the Northwestern Fruit Exchange, will be shorter than that of 1914, which comprised about 14,000 cars. The crop in the Yakima Valley is estimated at only 60 per cent. of that of 1914. Other experts say that Washington and Oregon will have fully as many apples as last year. In Colorado and California, where orchards have been well cared for, a good crop is expected.

FINANCIAL MARKETS

Recovery Again Follows Sharp Break — The Investment Demand for Bonds.

When the Stock Exchange adjourned on Friday the financial community was still entertaining the hope that the sinking of the Lusitania had not resulted in the loss of life. That hope contributed not a little to the vigor of the upturn which occurred in the last half hour of that session. This hope was shattered by yesterday morning's news and the market was, in consequence, subjected to another sharp setback. Opening prices in the leading active issues showed losses of from 1 to 3 points, and in some issues the declines were still larger. This selling was met in a way which indicated pretty plainly that supporting orders were in the market. The volume of liquidation was not so great as to overbear this support. The market was held practically at the opening prices and then moved upward not as rapidly as it had in the last thirty minutes on Friday, but nevertheless with a good deal of strength.

The possible rupture of relations with Germany as a result of the killing of many Americans in the sinking of the Lusitania was discussed, but the prevailing opinion was that a rupture would not occur. Yet there were many who were disposed to wait on the news from Washington at the beginning of the week, and even more, perhaps, on Germany's reply to the representations which every one expected would speedily be made by this Government. In high banking circles the belief was expressed that Washington would handle the matter in a way which would avoid an open breach, and that view was a substantial influence in steadying the market after the first drop in prices. There was clearly shown in the financial district a purpose to be calm in the face of the extreme resentment aroused by the sinking of a passenger ship without warning, and by the killing of many of its passengers and crew; but along with this purpose went a clear recognition of the graveness of the situation which this loss of many Americans has created.

Many stocks failed to recover the full amount of their initial decline, but nearly all closed substantially above the low for the day. The volume of trading was large for a half holiday, but was well under the dealings in the last hour on Friday. Practically no news exerted any influence apart from the various considerations connected with the Lusitania incident. That news found reflection in the bond market, as well as in the stock market, but despite this fact excellent progress was made in the placing of the new Pennsylvania issue of $65,000,000 4½ per cent. bonds. Naturally the very rapid response which was made to this offering during the early hours of Friday was checked by the news of the Lusitania, but the rate at which subscriptions continued to be received yesterday indicated the likelihood that the whole issue would be covered by Monday. The likelihood of this being true was being commented on in the bond circles as a striking proof of the substantial proportions of the current investment demand. It will be no small accomplishment for the investment market to absorb a $65,000,000 issue in forty-eight hours in the face of the most disturbing news from the American point of view which has grown out of the war in Europe.

The bank statement showed a loss in cash of $4,700,000 and a reduction of $1,400,000 in other reserve which, together, resulted in a decrease of $7,700,000 in surplus. deposits being slightly smaller than a week ago. Loans increased $14,800,000 despite the stock market liquidation of the week. The most severe of that liquidation, of course, did not occur until Friday and did not find reflection in yesterday's bank return.

TOPICS IN WALL STREET.

Resources of a Rich Nation.

The ability of the United States to provide funds for an emergency has never been tested to its full possibilities. When the question of the wisdom of bringing out an issue of $25,000,000 of Argentine bonds at a time when it is not improbable that the Government may have to raise a large sum through bond sales was broached to a banker yesterday he said that the money absorbed by the latest foreign offering would be so small in relation to the investing power of the hundred million people in this country as to make little difference. "Consider the civil war financing," he said. "The national wealth at that time was estimated at $16,000,000,000, and with a large part of the country engaged in financing the Confederacy there was little trouble in raising $2,000,000,000, almost entirely at home. With the wealth of the United States today estimated at $150,000,000,000 our resources for war are tremendous."

Too Many Eggs in One Basket.

The shock of the Lusitania disaster has taught many people that it is better to take small profits in the stock market than to try for big stakes on insufficient capital. The more conservative houses have been demanding from 30 to 50 points margin on issues such as Westinghouse and Bethlehem, which had advanced so rapidly as to make it certain that the stocks had not become distributed, but many persons were carrying these and other issues on as little as 10 points. A speculator whose commitments were divided between the war issues and the more settled railroad shares was not sold out Friday because his equity in the latter protected the broker, but many wealth hunters who had placed their all on one or two issues were sold out in the first downward rush of the market.

M. K. & T. Improves.

The outlook for the success of the announced plan of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Directors for a rearrangement of the company's finances, under which it will be possible to pay off the extended $19,000,000 note issue before the end of the year allowed by the extension, has been bettered by continued improvement in earnings. Since the beginning of the current calendar year the revenues have been on the up grade. April showed a gain in gross of $269,000, making the total since July 1 over $804,000. At this rate the surplus over charges for the fiscal year ending June 30 next promises to be at least twice the $340,000 shown last year. It is expected that the refunding of the notes can be accomplished without adding to the fixed charges either through a new issue of income bonds or of preferred stock.

Crop News Effect Neglected.

The stock market community was still too nervous over the destruction of the Lusitania yesterday to take account of developments of favorable import. Hence references heard to the excellent crop report were rather listless in tone as compared with worded conjectures about the possible action of the State Department because of the loss of American lives. The effect of the crop news is not likely to be lessened by delay in its recognition. Great crops do not always point the way to bull markets, but their influence in lending real stability to security values has been proved too often to be destroyed by a less permanent factor.

Discussion of the War Stocks.

It was difficult to say yesterday whether the blow struck at British commerce worked to depress the "war stocks" especially. Bethlehem Steel, American Locomotive, Baldwin Locomotive, and other issues whose companies have secured large orders from the allied powers were decidedly weak, but there were other issues weaker. The theory upon which the war stocks were sold was, of course, that increased submarine activity might prevent free shipments of munitions from this country to Europe, and that the profits of the manufacturers would suffer. The subject was discussed in many commission houses. It was stated by traders who had looked into war contracts that few of those actually signed could be affected by retarded shipping, as the goods were to be made and paid for, whatever circumstances arose.

NEWS OF THE CORPORATIONS AND THE BANKS

ARGENTINA'S NOTES AT 99.

Its $25,000,000 6 Per Cent. Issue to be Offered Tomorrow.

The $25,000,000 of five-year 6 per cent. notes issued by the Argentine Government through J. P. Morgan & Co., the National City Bank, Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and the First National Bank in this country, simultaneously with the offering of a like amount in pounds denomination by Baring Brothers and Morgan, Grenfell & Co. in London, will be publicly advertised tomorrow at 99. At this price the yield is 6¼ per cent. The offering to investors will be made in this city by the National City Bank, the Guaranty Trust Company, and Harris, Forbes & Co., but the other bankers reserve the right to share in the syndicate's takings. In Chicago the offering will be made by the Harris Trust and Savings Bank and the Illinois Trust and Savings Bank.

The price to those members of the syndicate who sell bonds will be 96, and to those who only share in the underwriting 96½. The net price made by Argentina has not been made public.

It is provided that after May 15, 1917, the dollar notes may be exchanged for the English notes and the pound notes for the dollar denominations, on the basis of $4.86 for exchange. The offerings here and abroad are to be kept entirely separate, and not to be shifted according to the demand in each country.

The proceeds of the loan, excepting only about $5,000,000, are to be used for refunding purposes, including payment for the $5,000,000 of Argentine 6 per cent. one-year notes sold here and maturing Dec. 15 next. Subscriptions to the new notes based on the early newspaper stories have been sifting into the banks for several days.

LONDON MARKET DULL.

Trading Depressed by Lusitania Disaster—Money and Discount Rates Quiet.

LONDON, May 8.—The stock market was depressed by the Lusitania disaster, which was the chief topic of conversation, and business in practically all sections was dull. Japanese and Chinese bonds hardened a fraction and Russian issues were better, but the war loan was easy. Cunard shares were nominal at 42s. 6d.

American securities reflected yesterday's decline in Wall Street, but only a few markings were reported as New York is unable to sell here under the Treasury regulations. Prices hung around parity and closed dull.

Money and discount rates were quiet.

New York Syndicate Takes Entire Issue of Securities.

NASHVILLE, Tenn., May 8.—The State Funding Board has sold $11,781,000 in 25 1-3-year average funding bonds to a syndicate composed of Redmond & Co., the Guaranty Trust Company, Brown Brothers & Co., White, Weld & Co., Kean, Taylor & Co., and Rhoades & Co., all of New York. The bonds were sold at a rate averaging 4.28 per cent.

The bonds include a $5,370,000 issue at 4 per cent. and an issue aggregating $6,411,000 with interest at 4½ per cent. The two issues were taken by the syndicate at par, and, in the opinion of bankers, the State disposed of the bonds on excellent terms.

Two other New York syndicates were bidders, one headed by Harris, Forbes & Co., and the other by N. W. Halsey & Co.

VARIED PHASES OF THE COUNTRY'S BUSINESS LIFE

THE MERCHANT'S POINT OF VIEW

Crop conditions are so important a factor in the nation's business welfare that the reports just made as to wheat and cotton were scanned with interest by others than those whose attention is usually directed toward them. The surplus of production in both of them forms the bulk of what goes up to make the balance of trade in favor of this country, with all that this implies in the stimulation of business in many lines. As things look at present, the prospects are good for another bumper wheat crop and a good foreign market for what will be grown. As to cotton, the best evidences are that the yield will be smaller than usual, and, while it is liable to show a small production per acre, it will probably be the cheapest crop raised in many years. Coincidentally with this information as to crops come reports from different portions of the country of improvement in general commercial business, the latest being from the Southwest and extending to the Pacific Coast.

Raw Material of the Textiles. No material changes occurred during the past week as to the raw material of the textiles. The flurry over an expected clash between Japan and China led to some weakness in the quotations for cotton, and these, in turn, were reflected in the easing of prices on certain constructions of printcloths. The mills, however, are in general holding firmly to the advanced prices. In bleached goods an exceptionally good business has been done, and the demand for fancies has been very gratifying. Colored goods are, of course, held very strongly, because of the dyestuffs situation, and certain kinds are only doled out to regular customers as needed. Large sales of duck continue, and a further big demand for cottons has come from the bagmakers, whose supplies of burlaps have been curtailed. The only speck of trouble that appears on the horizon for the cotton manufacturers is the British embargo on exports of Egyptian cotton. This is needed for use in certain directions, and also for mixing with the domestic article in certain others. It is believed, however, that the embargo will be modified, so far as this country is concerned, in the same manner in which that of wool was some time ago, and as natural indigo has just been. It is too soon to judge what effect, if any, will be caused by the uneasiness arising from the sinking of the Lusitania, but the course of the cotton market yesterday did not indicate it would result in depressing prices. The situation in raw silk promised to be complicated somewhat by the Japanese trouble, since most of the supplies of the article come from Japan. Should Italy be involved in the European war, that will be a disturbing factor, so far as Italian silks are concerned.

As to Wool and Woolens. There has been a decided easing up, so far as regards wool. This has been shown in the auction sales of the article in London, and not less so in the more conciliatory attitude of the wool growers out West. Great Britain seems to have on hand an ample supply for all war purposes, and shipments have been frequent and heavy. There is also a lot of wool yet available in Australasia and elsewhere. Large shipments have been coming into this country, in conformity to the plan worked out by the Textile Alliance, and the domestic makers of woolens have ceased to worry over the outlook. They are buying sparingly of Western wool and are keeping an eye on the prospects for the sale of cloths. The way that repeat orders for the heavyweight season have come in gives promise of good business. Before long, also, prices will be fixed for the Spring (1916) fabrics, for which already there is a disposition to bid.

Quaker City Atmosphere. There seems to be something in the atmosphere of Philadelphia which is conducive to pessimism and which brings persons subjected to its influence to the frame of mind of the elderly lady who opined she was "enjoying poor health." Nothing else, apparently, will explain the change of view of persons who come there full of confidence and soon lapse into a dejected condition. It was from that centre of satisfied gloom that came, some months ago, a piteous plea from the knit goods men, who averred that the lowering of tariff rates had destroyed their business and urged an immediate restoration of higher duties, lest they be forced to the wall. When the Secretary of the Department of Commerce, however, sent an expert commissioner to investigate the conditions, with a view to affording relief, the complaining manufacturers promptly sent a delegation to Washington asking that the investigation should not proceed. In explanation they stated that the ruin had not come as yet, but would at some time in the future, they were convinced. They had taken counsel of their fears. The same feeling was in evidence during the past week at the convention of the knit goods and hosiery manufacturers held in the same city. One of the principal speakers, who came from another city, deplored the effects of the tariff on the industry represented, and this was made the key of other utterances to the same purport. Yet this very speaker, at a meeting of the knit goods people in this city only a few months ago, had stated that the new tariff had not hurt the business. At the time he made the last-mentioned statement trade in the lines was very much less than it is now. Meanwhile, too, not only has the domestic business improved greatly, but the exports of these goods have been increased nearly 400 per cent., while imports have decreased. It is barely possible that something else than atmosphere may explain the discrepancy of the statements made, perhaps the disposition to talk politics instead of business.

Knit Goods Industry. Everybody present at the convention was aware of the fact that there are more knitting mills in the country than suffice to supply the needs of the people of the United States. More of them are coming into being every year, despite all the talk that they are not a paying investment, and this has continued to be the case ever since the Underwood tariff went into effect. Unless, therefore, a foreign demand can be stimulated, all of the mills cannot run on full time the year around, even though a tariff were in force which would shut out all foreign competition. This, although one of the principal troubles in the trade, was not alluded to. In order, however, to export, it is necessary that the goods shall be put down in a foreign country at as low a price as foreign competitors can do it. If this can be done, no tariff is needed to prevent foreign competition in this country. In certain lines of hosiery there is a good export trade now, and even in underwear American goods are finding a market abroad. The situation is full of hope that, even after the conclusion of hostilities abroad, much of the trade will be retained. That mills which are turning out more goods than this country can use will content themselves with limiting their output and the wages of their men just to hold the home market and uphold a high tariff is possible, but hardly probable. It does not look like good business.

Prospects for the Future. Conjecture has been rife on what is to happen to trade and industry here and abroad after the war. All kinds of theories have been advanced, and the belief in certain of them is responsible for some of the apprehension which exists and acts as a damper on enterprise. One great fear seems to be that the industrial nations of Europe, more particularly Germany, Great Britain, France, and Belgium, will, the moment hostilities cease, begin feverishly to try and regain the trade they have lost and will sell their manufactured goods at any price they can get, even below cost. Those who believe this are urging an increase in the tariff, and fear that otherwise this country will be swamped with cheap foreign goods that will be the despair of the domestic manufacturer. As against this theory, however, are certain economic circumstances. At present, in all the warring countries, wages are exceedingly high in the various handicrafts. It will be an impossibility after peace comes to reduce them to the level they had before the war. Then, too, many of the skilled workmen will be dead or crippled, and this fact will also tend to keep wages high for those who remain and are competent. The large war taxes which will have to be levied will call for an amount of taxation on industries that must affect the cost of production in practically every line of industry. Most persons are convinced that the costs of production will be raised almost to, if not quite equal to, those in this country. If the results are anything like what followed the close of the civil war in this country, there will be less, rather than more, to fear from foreign competition after the war than there was before. On the other hand, there will be a great demand from the devastated cities and towns for materials for rebuilding, much of which must come from this country. In anticipation of such demand, American contracting firms have had their representatives abroad for some time, to go over the ground and make arrangements in advance.

New Kinds of Exports. Students of trade statistics nowadays meet with surprises in examining the figures of exports from this country. The most obvious one, of course, is the great increase in the shipments of grain and other foodstuffs, horses, munitions of war, certain kinds of leather, and knit and woven fabrics of cotton and wool. To these increases repeated attention has been called from week to week and at other stated intervals. As significant, at least, is the appearance in the lists of exports of articles which hitherto have not so appeared. Three of these are worthy of mention. They are babbitt metal, of which 432,031 pounds, valued at $72,570, were exported in the eight months ended with February; bauxite concentrates, of which 7,170 tons, worth $318,348, were so shipped, and soda salts to the value of $1,048,194. In connection with these may be set forth the fact that the substances grouped in the Commerce Department's reports as "other chemicals" increased during the eight months about $5,000,000 over the corresponding period the year before, or about 100 per cent. Much of the shipments of the soda salts is caustic soda, for which France is the best customer, although many other countries have also called for it. The Oil, Paint, and Drug Reporter announced in its last issue that inquiries have even come from Great Britain, which has usually been the great factor in the export of the article. Foreign engagements during the past month, according to the same paper, are estimated at about 50,000 tons, while the annual capacity of the plants making it in this country is only about 200,000 tons, of which 175,000 is the normal domestic consumption. Some residuum of this kind of trade is bound to stick even after the war is ended.

SILK BUYERS ARE NOT PROTECTED

Why the Chops or Marks Affixed to the Raw Material Cannot Be Relied On.

In buying Japanese raw silk, the manufacturers have to depend upon the good faith of those who supply them, or upon their own knowledge of silk quality and value. But the system of handling raw silk in the domestic manufacturing trade makes it impossible for the buyers to become judges of the products they use, except in a very indirect and unsatisfactory way. As a device to protect the manufacturers, "chops" or brands were adopted to denote various grades and qualities of silk. These chops fall under two classifications, the original chop or brand of the reeler himself and the private chop of the importer, guaranteeing, through inspection, a certain quality.

There are a number of silk manufacturers who still insist upon original chops, and think by getting these brands that they are running no chance of being imposed upon. As a prominent silk importer pointed out, however, the manufacturer has absolutely no protection either by reason of the original or the private chop. These brands may be manipulated in such a manner that one season they will represent a certain grade of raw silk and a short time afterward another. Take the case of the manufacturer who demands an original chop, which, for the sake of example, may be designated as three stars. He orders fifty bales of the three-star brand. Of the fifty bales of this chop, which the importer buys to fill this order, a certain percentage will be imperfect and not up to the quality of the rest. This holds true in all branches of production or manufacturing. There may be eight bales of that fifty-bale order that are imperfect. If the reeler wishes to use good faith in the transaction, he will inform the importer that there are eight bales below quality. Granting that he does, the importer has yet to determine whether it is good policy to inform his customer that part of the silk is not up to standard.

The ethics of the question demands, of course, that he make known the imperfection of those eight bales, and yet such information given to the manufacturer, especially if the market has declined between the placing of the order and the shipment, may mean a cancellation of the entire contract. What is to be done? The importer is tempted to accept the forty-two bales of silk up to grade, and the eight that are not, in the original chops, and tender them to his customer in New York, thus indirectly compelling the buyer to accept poor silk. If he wishes knowingly to substitute any silk the mere requirement of an original chop of a filature does not prevent him from doing so. He has ordered in the past silk from that same reeler, but has substituted his private chop for the three-star emblem. He has those chops on hand, and all that remains for him to do under the circumstances is to use up those guarantee tickets on the imperfect silk that has been shipped to him without the three-star mark. He then pockets the difference between the price of the silk substituted and that paid for the good silk. It is impossible for the reeler to know whether his product gets to the manufacturer labeled the way it was shipped. He may protest that deception was used and yet he has no way of tracing his product. The importer, for instance, ordered in all 100 bales. Half of this quantity he put out under his private chop, so he may use the original chops from fifty bales on silk from another reeler.

Besides this possible manipulation on the part of the importer, there are other conditions that detract from any value that might originally have been placed in the chop as a guarantee. There are so-called original chops that are merely the brands of rewinders, Japanese merchants who have not a basin in which to reel silk. A silk importer tells the result of an investigation he conducted into one such case.

"There was a certain very popular chop introduced to the market here not long ago," said he, "and such a large quantity of silk under this brand was sold that we determined to investigate. I went to see this man in order to make arrangements for marketing his product. He wanted us to take 15,000 bales. This, of course, was an impossible quantity for any one reeler to turn out, and, as I soon learned, he was merely acting as the marketing agent for a large number of small reelers. His chop then represented nothing more or less than the silk he bought from numerous small filatures in a certain district. He was concerned merely with the inspection of silk and its rewinding into skeins suitable for export, silk being sold in longer hanks for the export than for the home trade. This shows the fallacy of placing any dependence on chops. They are changed constantly. If a dealer goes out of business and his chop has attained a certain degree of popularity, it is adopted by another dealer. If a brand loses its reputation, the same silk is marketed under another chop. In fact, it is possible to buy chops in Japan in much the same way as post cards, and from the same sources.

"The private chop of the importer, however, assures much greater protection to the manufacturer. The importer has no interest in the chop of the reeler. If a complaint is made that a certain brand is deteriorating, he sympathizes with the manufacturer, shrugs his shoulders, and advises switching to another brand. This in turn may not come up to standard. The importer, however, is not greatly disturbed. The burden of blame rests upon the reeler, not on him. With his private chop it is a different matter. When the importer guarantees the quality of a certain silk and gives his guarantee that the silk has passed inspection, he has something to lose if it falls into disfavor. Immediately he sets his home office on the task of improving the silk and making more careful inspections."

The question of putting faith in chops, whether original or private, takes on a broader meaning, however, when viewed from the aspect that such guarantees have to be trusted in place of sure and certain knowledge of quality and value. As stated before, the system in vogue among manufacturers at the present time renders it next to impossible to obtain an adequate knowledge of the raw product. The importer, it seems, calls up the manufacturer when a certain shipment has arrived and receives instruction relating to the throwster who is to prepare the silk. The throwster checks off the shipment and employs a common process, although the silk may vary in one lot from the other. In short, the same process being applied to varying silks naturally makes the result vary, and, therefore, causes trouble to the manufacturer, though the silks may be fully up to grade.

With the foreign manufacturers a different system is followed. The silk is sold to the throwster abroad who has a definite result to be obtained when he orders it. He wants a certain strength or a specified amount of elasticity. He puts the silk through tests before preparing it, in order to see if the product is suited to his purpose. When his analysis is completed he varies his process in accordance with his findings on the silks, always keeping in mind the final results. Consequently, though he gets all up-to-grade silks, yet varying in merits, he always obtains the same results. Thus the European consumer of Japanese silks is able to get better results than his competitor in this country.

Wool Prices Hardening.

LONDON, May 8.—At the wool auction sales today a medium selection of 7,800 bales was offered. The demand was good. Withdrawals were small, owing to the recent hardening of the market. Crossbreds and medium fine grades are now only from par to 5 per cent. below the last sales, and the inferior grades from 5 to 7½ per cent.

LATEST CUSTOMS RULINGS.

Sugar, Paper, and Bagging Among the Things Considered.

The Franklin Sugar Refining Company, Philadelphia, after asking the Collector to make a re-test on imported raw sugar, which it was claimed by the importer was returned at too high a classification, refused to accept the results of a second test made by the Government officers. In accordance with the practice of the Treasury Department, the duty was based on the average of the two tests. An appeal followed to the Board of General Appraisers, which yesterday overruled the contention that the second test was faulty, and affirmed the Collector.

F. Bertuch & Co., Philadelphia, imported straw pulp, which was claimed to be free of duty under the terms of the Canadian reciprocity law dealing with paper and wood pulp. Judge Somerville held that the provisions of the reciprocity act do not apply to straw pulp, and affirmed the Collector in taking the regular duty provided for in the tariff act. Several decisions were made dealing with importations claimed to be exempt from duty under the Canadian convention. M. Gottesman & Son was sustained in claims affecting wood pulp from Norway, but overruled regarding importations from France. Hensel, Bruckmann & Lorbacher were denied free entry on paper from Germany on the ground that it was worth over 4 cents per pound. Similar action was taken in the case of O. G. Hempstead & Son, Philadelphia, relating to German wood pulp.

Oberle & Henry, New Orleans, failed in the opinion of the board to make good their claim for free entry of cut sugar bags. They were returned at 10 per cent. as waste not specially provided for, whereas the protestants claimed free entry as waste bagging. Paragraph 566, under which exemption was sought, provides for waste bagging used chiefly for paper-making. While the importers testified that this particular shipment was sold to a paper mill, presumably for the purpose of paper-making, there was no positive testimony that merchandise of this kind is chiefly so used. The Collector was affirmed.

The Holtz & Freystedt Co. lost in claims for allowance in duty on account of breakage in shipments of brandy. The Collector reported that the cases alleged to have contained the broken bottles were not under examination by Appraiser Sague, nor was any shortage reported by the discharging officers. The importers' testimony was not convincing. In view of the report and evidence the board affirmed the Collector.

TESTING TARIFF ON DYES.

Cases Involving Duties on Them Before the Appraisers.

Importers of coal tar products from Germany have begun proceedings before the Board of General Appraisers, having for their purpose the letting down of the tariff bars on certain derivatives used in various industries other than the textile. The wide increase in the application of the colors in controversy to industrial uses, coupled with the fact that the present tariff carries for the first time a provision for "color lakes" as against the word "lake" formerly used in tariff acts, are understood to be responsible for the latest litigation under the coal tar schedule of the law.

The Bayer Company, one of the largest importers and handlers in this country of German dyestuffs and chemicals, appears as the protestant in the test case, which is likely to have a run before the Customs Court of Appeals. The products in controversy are chiefly used in making printing, lithographic, and typewriter inks, as well as paints. Collector Malone classified them as coal tar colors under a long-established practice, and took duty under the present tariff at the rate of 30 per cent. ad valorem. The Bayer Company relied at the hearings on the claim that most of the products are properly dutiable as pigments at 15 per cent. ad valorem under paragraph 63. As to some of the importations, it was insisted duty accrues at 20 per cent. as "color lakes."

Also involved in the firm's protests is a group of indigo colors likewise assessed by the Collector at 30 per cent. under the coal tar paragraph. John Francis Strauss, of Strauss & Hedges, counsel for the Bayer concern, told the board that these last named products should properly be admitted under the tariff free of duty as dyes obtained from indigo.

At the present time the Customs Court has before it a test case brought by Herman A. Metz, as President of the Farbwerk-Hoechst Company, looking to the judicial construction to be given the term "color lakes" as appearing in the tariff, which when decided, may be a determining factor in the disposition of the color lake contentions advanced by the Bayer Company in the case now under consideration by the board. Two weeks were given the opposing counsel in the Bayer case to file briefs, after which the board will promulgate a decision.

AT FALL RIVER MILLS.

Trading Limited, but Prices Generally Well Maintained.

FALL RIVER, May 8.—There was restricted trading in the cotton goods market this week. The easing off of cotton had the effect of causing buyers to withdraw from the markets, and many will keep out until conditions become more favorable for buying. Prices have been generally well maintained, but there are cases where slight concessions have been made.

As has been the case for some time past, buyers confined their attention for the most part to wide and medium wide goods, although there was a fair quantity of narrow goods sold. The whole cloth situation is strong, although not active. The fine goods markets are doing a fair amount of business and reports show that some of these mills are making fairly good profits.

The feature of disturbance in the textile trade is the big strike at the Fall River Iron Works Mills owned by M. C. D. Borden & Sons of Worth Street, New York. A strike was ordered among the union weavers, because, it is alleged, some of the weavers were required to run their looms during the noon hour. As the result of the strike, other departments in six of the big mills of this corporation closed down. The week closed in the cotton goods markets with the demand somewhat light.

Gray Goods a Little Easier.

Prices on spot printcloths have eased off a little as the result of events of the last few days, and it is now possible to get these goods from first hands at a sixteenth to an eighth less than figures which prevailed at the beginning of the week. While the mills were more willing yesterday to take bids for the later deliveries at the figures suggested before the break in cotton came, they steadfastly refused to accept offers for such deliveries at the new prices. Large bids of 4¾ cents were made and refused during the morning for 39-inch. 68-72s for June-November delivery, and bids of 6 cents for 80 squares met a similar fate. Spot sales of 38½-inch. 60-48s were made at 3⅞ cents. For the most part the usual Saturday atmosphere prevailed in the market. Spot prices were:

39-inch. 80-80s....6⅝c	38½-inch. 64-56s..4c
39-inch. 72-76s....5⅝c	38½-inch. 60-52s..3¾c
39-inch. 68-72s....4¾c	38½-inch. 60-48s..3⅞c
38½-inch. 64-64s..4¼c	27-inch. 64-60s....3c
38½-inch. 64-60s..4⅛c	27-inch. 56-52s....2⅝c

More Cotton Used in Mills.

FALL RIVER, May 8.—The official statistics showing the number of bales of cotton forwarded to the cotton mills of this city for nine months of the current cotton year have just been made public. The statement shows that since August, 1914, to April, 1915, the total of 366,182 bales of cotton were received against 328,190 for the corresponding period a year ago, a difference of 37,992 bales.

MAKING TARIFF RATES UNIFORM

Increased Duties Obtained from Changes in Classification of Imports.

The activity displayed of late by the Treasury Department in raising duty by changing classifications under the tariff law is proving disquieting to importers, who claim that there is now no telling over night how long an apparently established rate on a given line of goods will remain. Merchants have been for some months at a loss to account for the upward movement in rates, and in some quarters the tendency has been to blame domestic manufacturers for some of the advances.

Some of the changes made recently calling for higher duties than those heretofore prevailing under the present law are as follows: Seamless rugs, formerly no uniformity, now 50 per cent. ad valorem; balbuse gum, formerly free as crude rubber, and now 15 per cent. ad valorem as a non-enumerated manufactured article; meat balls, bouillon tablets, Bavarian sausage, and other meat products, formerly free as "prepared meat," now 15 per cent. as articles non-enumerated; chrysarobin, formerly 10 per cent. under the chemical schedule, now 15 or 20 per cent. ad valorem, depending upon the weight of the package. Also, beets, whole or sliced, in hermetically sealed tins, formerly 5 per cent. as "beets of all kinds," now dutiable as vegetables, cut, sliced, or prepared, 25 per cent. ad valorem; orange-wood sticks, used by dentists, clock and watchmakers, formerly at varying lower rates, now 15 per cent. as non-enumerated articles; nose glasses and stages for microscopes, formerly 20 per cent., now 25 per cent.; die-cut labels, formerly 15 per cent., now 25 per cent., and a great variety of "parts" of articles enumerated under Paragraph 356, formerly at lower rates and now 60 per cent. ad valorem. Another higher classification is Japanese white oak flooring, formerly free, but now 15 per cent. ad valorem. Other changes in classification imposing higher rates will be announced shortly.

Under former tariffs the charge was frequently made by importers, and often substantiated, that at the behests of the manufacturers duty rates were raised by the Treasury Department to ward off foreign competition. It was supposed that under this Administration, acts of the kind complained of could not occur, and there is no evidence to be had showing that the manufacturers have influenced the department in any of the advances made under the present tariff.

From what could be learned yesterday from officials of the local customs, it would seem that the movement came from the Treasury Department itself. As explained, the Government was confronted last Fall with an unforseen situation as a result of the European war and the attendant drop in revenue from falling imports. Secretary McAdoo and his assistants reached the conclusion that it would be necessary to scan minutely the various schedules of the tariff with a view to ascertaining whether customs officials throughout the country were taking the duties contemplated by Congress on the different lines of imported merchandise.

Among other things, it was decided to form a so-called Classification Committee at this port, whose duty it should be in conjunction with the Comparative Valuation Report Bureau, already located here, to study the rates on goods and recommend such changes as in the judgment of the committee individual cases warranted. The committee was appointed last November, and quietly settled down to its work without its formation being generally known outside immediate customs circles.

This committee, which appears to have developed into a powerful factor in Treasury administration of the tariff in a comparatively short period of time, consists of E. H. Allendorf, Deputy Collector, Liquidating Division, Collector's Office; John Bangs, Deputy Naval Officer of the Port, in charge of liquidations, and G. W. Wolf, Deputy Appraiser of the Port. This committee, it seems, is among other things charged with going over the reports received from the Comparative Valuation Report Bureau, particularly in cases where it develops that customs officers at the several ports of the country are returning identical merchandise at different rates of duty.

Mr. Wolf said yesterday that the committee is meeting regularly once a week and sometimes oftener, as occasion requires. He said: "The work we are charged with is voluminous and requires detailed study. So far as lies in the committee's power, it is trying to solve classification puzzles in a manner harmonious with the intent of Congress, and at the same time fair to the importing interests. A great many variations in classifications on the same merchandise are found at the different ports, and after due consideration the committe reports to headquarters in Washington what it thinks the proper rate should be on a given line. The accuracy of the committee's work may be gauged by the fact that the Treasury Department has so far adopted our recommendations with only one exception."

At the present time the committee appears to exert a good part of its energy in "rewriting" the tariff schedules upward. It was pointed out, however, at the Custom House yesterday that the committee had more than justified the reason for its appointment, and that importers dissatisfied with the increased rates of duty recommended by the committee and indorsed by the Treasury Department, had their remedy in appeals to the Board of General Appraisers and the Customs Court, where full adjudication can be had. Customs attorneys said the committee's activities were not unwelcome to them, as they made for more litigation.

The Treasury Department officials are reported as of the belief that many of the higher rates recommended by the committee and put into effect by the department will stand the test of the courts and result in the tariff materially increasing its powers as a revenue-maker. In any event the Government will be the gainer for the present at least, as it collects the higher rates and holds the money so obtained until final adjudication is reached in any given controversy.

Some Vagaries of Trade.

The annual report on the "Commerce and Navigation of the United States," a writer in Commerce Reports points out, discloses some unusual and unexpected facts. Thus, a quarter million dollars' worth of women's dress models were imported from France, one-half million dollars' worth of iodine from China, and trophies and other prizes to the value of $100,000 were brought from Europe by Americans. Two million dozen eggs were imported from China and 3,000,000 more from other countries, over half a million palm leaf fans from China, and $1,000,000 worth of human hair from Germany, France, and other countries. Then, as instances of the strange vagaries of foreign trade, there were sent from here last year, watches to Switzerland, coffee to Mexico, cotton goods to England, chinaware to China, electric motors to France, telephones to South Africa, canned salmon to Scandinavia, lard to Greece, German silver to Germany, rubber shoes to Brazil, poultry to Turkey, elevators to the Netherlands, and bathtubs to Egypt.

Active Demand for Waists.

Waist manufacturers find that the demand this season is of a well-sustained and profitable character. A variety of styles is being taken and the good business that is being done may be largely attributed to this. Just now Japanese and tub silks are the principal fabrics used, and they are sold chiefly in white and flesh tints. The semi-tailored design is a popular style.

TANK STEAMER FOR WINE.

The California Product Will Be Brought Here That Way.

A novel scheme for the transportation of California wines to this city, for distribution all over the world, has been decided on by the California Wine Association. The object of the plan is to increase the use of these wines throughout the globe by eliminating the high freight charges which now work to the advantage of the European growers, and it includes the shipment of the domestic wines to this city in a specially designed tank ship. The wine will thus be carried much after the manner of transporting oil.

According to a trade authority the vessel in question is designed to make six round trips a year between this city and San Francisco, and will carry 4,200,000 gallons of wine here during the twelve months. Because the association's members ship about 10,000,000 gallons of wine here during the course of the year, it is said to be planned eventually to put two other and similar vessels in this service. Solid freight will be carried on the return trip to avoid the expense of sailing back empty. Oil fuel will be used, and enough of it will be carried to bring the vessel from San Francisco to this city and then back to Balboa, where the supply will be renewed.

The present plans call for the discharge of the wine at some central distributing point in this city, where it will be placed in barrels or bottles, according to the needs of the trade. The wine will be kept at an even temperature during the trip, and special means have been taken to guard against its contamination by sea water. Each tank will have an independent pumping system that will discharge the wine at the rate of approximately 10,000 gallons an hour. The tanks will be loaded by the same system.

A reduction of about 40 per cent. in the freight rates is expected to result from this bulk carrying of wine, and this is expected to lower the selling cost of the wine abroad to such an extent that a considerably improved business will be done.

BUSINESS ASSOCIATIONS.

New Directory of Them in Preparation by the Government.

E. E. Pratt, Chief of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, is sending letters to the various commercial organizations in an endeavor to get the material necessary for the revision of its directory of the National, State, and local business organizations of the country. It is the desire of the bureau to make the new directory as nearly complete and accurate as can be done in order to make it of as great value as possible to the business world generally.

The work of revision is being undertaken at the suggestion of many business organizations, which point out the value of the directory, and a portion of the bureau's staff has been given over to it. Prompt and full information concerning the various bodies is urged. On a form sent out with the letters, definite information is sought regarding the primary purpose of the various associations, whether there is an official journal, and the bureaus or departments maintained over which salaried officials preside. The latter information was not furnished in last year's reports to the bureau. Information is also desired as to whether the associations are affiliated in any way with any organized effort, bureau, school, or association, in behalf of vocational guidance, industrial education, or placement, and if so the method of co-operation.

BUSINESS NOTES.

A new Lehigh Valley Railroad barge station will be opened tomorrow at Pier 44, East River, between Gouverneur and Jackson Streets. It will be used chiefly for the delivery of flour and other package freight.

According to La Prensa of Buenos Aires the manufacture of cigarettes in Argentina last year reached a total of 550,000,000 boxes, while 300,000,000 cigars and 9,920,700 pounds of leaf tobacco were produced.

A meeting of the Illuminating Engineering Society, New York branch, will be held Thursday night at 8:15 P. M. in the Engineering Societies Building. C. E. Clewell, Assistant Professor of Electrical Engineering, University of Pennsylvania, and E. H. Bostock, will be the principal speakers. Norman Macbeth will preside.

THE CLIMB OF ANTIMONY.

Something of the Part This Metal Plays in the World.

One of the freaks of the European war reflected upon this country is the amazing upheaval of metal values. Just before the war tin, which is looked up to as the highest priced of all commercial metals, sold at about 31 cents per pound, and antimony, looked down upon as a metal almost too cheap to bother about, sold for as little as 5½ cents per pound. Neither of these metals is produced in this country, England being master of the tin situation, while antimony's mastery was divided between England, France, Spain, Austria, China, and Japan, none of whom took particular pride in their lowly offspring.

Immediately upon the declaration of war the price of tin jumped. Two weeks after England stepped into the fray it doubled to 62 cents and, for a time, even brought 65 cents per pound. Poor old antimony struggled to rise, encouraged by the knowledge that it is an indispensable element in the manufacture of ammunition but, although by a supreme effort it raised itself to 13 cents, the world's immediate supply was so great that it soon fell four rungs of the ladder and then, for a while, hovered between 9 and 13 cents, until the first of the year. About that time all eyes were centred on spelter, which suddenly started on a spectacular rise from 5 to 14 cents, and nobody seemed to take notice of antimony's renewed effort until, during intermission at the spelter circus, people looked about, and there was friend antimony solidly perched upon the fortieth rung of the metal ladder, looking down with a grin upon high-brow tin, which was sitting disconsolately a rung below.

The use of antimony is to harden the softer metals, such as tin and lead, in the manufacture of shrapnel shells, babbitt for machinery bearings, type metal, and castings of all kinds. In its pure state it cannot be employed for any useful purpose, owing to its extreme brittleness. Its value in alloying, however, is great, not only because it hardens metal, but because of its low melting point.

The scarcity of this commodity here is even much more serious than that of dyestuffs, which received so much interest of late, for, while the shutting off of our dyestuff supply may affect our aesthetic taste, the shutting off of antimony would affect practically every convenience we have learned to enjoy. There isn't a home, rich or poor, that hasn't dozens of things in which antimony is an essential ingredient. The very power which furnishes electricity for light and for driving the cars is dependent upon great wheels which are run upon babbitt bearings made of tin and antimony. Every wheel that turns runs upon similar material. The newspapers we read are printed with type, of which antimony is a most important part. In fact, it might be said that the whole world's comfort rests upon this metal, heretofore so little known about by the public.

About the only plan to relieve the present situation would be to mine and refine the material here. But that is easier said than done. In a country with such vast mineral resources as ours, a quantity sufficient for our needs could undoubtedly be mined, but to prepare facilities for refining the ore would involve a considerable expense and a good deal of time. And after the war, the expensive refineries would be a white elephant, as the price would surely be forced down by European and Asiatic competitors, who have demonstrated that they can mine, refine, and ship the metal for less money than we could afford to handle it.

And, meanwhile, antimony users are adjusting telescopes to their eyes to get a better view of its lofty position, wondering whether it's going on another upward climb.

Von Bernstorff Receives a Letter Saying the Place Is to be Blown Up.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, May 9.—So far no word has come from the White House or other authoritative quarter as to what course the Administration will take with reference to the loss of American lives in the Lusitania disaster. This causes no surprise, for it is now understood that President Wilson has not determined on a line of action and will not attempt to do so until he has all the facts at hand and has refreshed his memory as to the events involving the United States that have led up to the sinking of the great ocean liner.

That the foremost members of the Administration look with horror on the attack on the Lusitania is clear. Not that any of them is expressing himself even privately to persons having no connection with the Government, but it is apparent from the views of lesser officials, who reflect the opinions of their chiefs, that throughout Administration circles sentiment is condemnatory of the sinking of the Cunarder without warning or affording the opportunity to the passengers to escape, as required by the rule of international law, to which this Government has already expressed its adherence in a communication to Germany.

To what extent the personal condemnation of the destruction of the Lusitania will influence the action of the President and his advisers is something, however, that cannot be foretold.

Nation's Prestige Involved.

The impression was gathered today that one of the most serious aspects of the problem being considered by the President—that is, the problem of the course to be taken by the United States—involved the question of the national prestige. Officials are not unmindful of the criticism that it has contented itself with protests over the various acts of the European belligerents that have apparently infringed the rights of this Government as a neutral. Nor have they overlooked the fact that in the note to the German Government remonstrating against the implied threat to extend the submarine warfare to American merchant vessels, very strong language was used, language, in fact, that has been construed as a declaration of an intention to take positive action if American ships were sunk on the high seas or American lives destroyed. It has not been overlooked that certain German newspapers, described as radically anti-American, have asserted that the Government of the United States would be satisfied with the payment of money as reparation for the loss of American lives in the Lusitania disaster, and that in England the question is being asked significantly: "What will America do?"

Eyes of World Are on Us.

In the minds of some people here, these things indicate that if this Government does not take a strong stand in communicating with Germany on the subject of the killing of Americans on the Lusitania the impression may be created throughout the civilized world that the United States will not resort to the use of force to support its protests against acts of any of the European belligerents directed against citizens of this country, no matter how serious and illegal these acts may be. This situation, it was intimated today, must be taken into consideration by The President and his advisers when they come to discuss the policy that the Government should pursue in dealing with the Lusitania incident.

Washington is wondering more than ever today over the fact that Presi-

United States Must Act at Once on Lusitania, Says Colonel Roosevelt

Special to The New York Times.

SYRACUSE, May 9.—Theodore Roosevelt expects the United States Government to take immediate action because of the sinking of the Lusitania. Colonel Roosevelt said that if this Government was to hold Germany "to strict accountability," as it promised to do in the event American citizens were killed in the submarine war, it could only mean that "action will be taken by us without an hour's unnecessary delay."

This is the Colonel's statement:

"On the night of the day that the disaster occurred I called the attention of our people to the fact that the sinking of the Lusitania was not only an act of simple piracy, but that it represented piracy accompanied by murder on a vaster scale than any oldtime pirate had ever practiced before being hung for his misdeeds.

"I called attention to the fact that this was merely the application on the high seas, and, at our expense, of the principles which when applied on land had produced the innumerable hideous tragedies that have occurred in Belgium and in Northern France.

"I said that not only our duty to humanity at large, but our duty to preserve our own national self-respect demanded instant action on our part and forbade all delay.

"I can do little more than reiterate what I thus said.

"When the German decree establishing the war zone was issued, and of course plainly threatened exactly the type of tragedy which has occurred, our Government notified Germany that in the event of any such wrongdoing at the expense of our citizens we would hold the German Government to 'a strict accountability.'

"The use of this phrase, 'strict accountability,' of course, must mean, and can only mean, that action will be taken by us without an hour's unnecessary delay. It was eminently proper to use the exact phrase that was used, and having used it our own self-respect demands that we forthwith abide by it."

LUSITANIA WAS UNARMED

Collector Malone Says She Was Examined Before Sailing.

DENIAL BY CUNARD MEN

Never Carried a Gun and Never Was in British Admiralty Service.

'HELPLESS AS A FERRY BOAT'

Munitions of War on Board Non-Explosive and Carried as Regular Commerce.

ROBERTS EXPLAINS FLAGS

Carried Only the Pennant of a Merchantman and the Usual House Mail Insignia.

Dudley Field Malone, Collector of the Port, gave an official denial yesterday to the German charge that the Lusitania had guns mounted when she left this port on Saturday, May 1. He said

"This report is not correct. The Lusitania was inspected before sailing, as is customary.

"No guns were found, mounted or unmounted, and the vessel sailed without any armament. No merchant ship would be allowed to arm in this port and leave the harbor."

This statement was given out by the Collector yesterday morning at his home, 230 Riverside Drive.

Herman Winter, Assistant Manager of the Cunard Line, 22 State Street, who was on the Lusitania for three hours before she sailed for Liverpool, denied the report that she ever carried any guns.

"It is true," Mr. Winter said, "that she had aboard 4,200 cases of cartridges, but they were cartridges for small arms, packed in separate cases, and could not have injured the vessel by exploding. They certainly do not come under the classification of ammunition. The United States authorities would not permit us to carry ammunition, classified as such by the military authorities, on a passenger liner. For years we have been sending small-arms cartridges abroad on the Lusitania.

"The Lusitania had 1,250 steel shrapnel cases, but they were empty. There was no explosive of any sort aboard. As to the report that the Lusitania had guns aboard, I cannot assert too strongly that it is positively untrue. There were no guns whatever aboard. The Lusitania was an unarmed passenger steamer. Furthermore, she never has been armed, and never carried an unmounted gun or rifle out of port in times of war or peace."

Defenseless as a Ferryboat.

"Then you unqualifiedly declare that the Lusitania was not armed against submarines?" he was asked.

"The ship," Mr. Winter replied, "was as defenseless against undersea and underhanded attack as a Hoboken ferryboat in the North River, would be against one of the United States battleships."

Captain D. J. Roberts, Marine Superintendent of the Cunard Line, said yesterday that he was prepared to testify under oath in any court and from his personal knowledge, that the Lusitania did not carry any guns when she sailed from New York at 12:28 P. M. on May 1, for Liverpool.

"It is my invariable custom to go through the passenger ships every day they are in port," he said, "and I made my last inspection of the Lusitania on sailing day at 7 A. M. There were no guns or plates or mountings where guns could be fitted on the Lusitania nor have there been since she has been in the service. The ship has never carried troops or been chartered by the British Government for any purpose whatsoever.

"In order that there should be no mistake about the ensigns flown by British merchant vessels, the Admiralty ordered after war had been declared that only the red ensign, a square red flag with the union jack in the corner, should be shown at the stern of a merchantman, and the white St. George's ensign by all war vessels, whether armored or unarmored. These are the only two flags that are hoisted on British ships today, with the exception of the company's house flag, when they are entering port or passing at sea, and the mail flag on the foremast, which every steamship flies coming in to denote that she has mails on board.

"Before the war both the Lusitania and the Mauretania flew the blue ensign of the Royal Naval Reserve, which any British merchant vessel is allowed to do if her commander and officers and two-thirds of the crew belong to the reserve."

ADMIRALTY TO AVOID ANSWERS TO CRITICS

Unofficially, It Is Stated That Complaints Are Based on Slight Knowledge.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, May 10.—From an un[illegible]

New York Times correspondent learns that it is unlikely that the Admiralty will at present take any official cognizance of the criticisms which are being made in the English and American press and by survivors of the Lusitania. That is to say, no official reply in the form of rebuttal or explanation will be issued. These criticisms, according to THE TIMES informant, are based upon imperfect knowledge or inadequate appreciation of the circumstances.

A chief complaint is that the Lusitania's course and her speed on entering the war zone were dictated by the Admiralty. Next it is alleged that so important a vessel should have been convoyed through dangerous waters. It is also stated that as German submarines were presumably known to the Admiralty to be lurking in Southwestern Irish waters, the Lusitania should have been ordered to take another course to Liverpool.

To the last criticism the question is added why critics assume that the course south of Ireland was any less dangerous than the course around the north of Ireland would have been. The quiescence of the German submarines for a period prior to the sinking of the Lusitania gives color to the idea that the German Admiralty had been mobilizing its submarine forces for one particular purpose.

The question of the Lusitania's speed in the war zone is another point on which individual judgment has a wide field of operation, but one point is suggested in this connection. In reckoning what a submarine commander must do and at what angle he must discharge a torpedo so as to hit his target the rate at which the latter was moving through the water must be a prime consideration.

It is suggested that Captain Turner may have argued that the submarine officer would assume the Lusitania would put on top speed in dangerous waters and so calculated that by going at 16 or 18 knots a torpedo, fired at him under the belief that he was travelling at 25 knots, would miss.

With regard to the question of convoy, there are many considerations which, according to THE TIMES informant, should occur to all who have studied the existing conditions of naval warfare. One of them is that to the British Admiralty the sinking of the Lusitania is only an incident (however important and regrettable) in the general scheme of operations for which it is responsible. General military considerations must determine the Admiralty's actions.

It may be said here that among naval and shipping men the criticisms, now being leveled at Captain Turner, are generally regarded as uninformed or at least premature.

CALLS SINKING A NAVAL DUTY

Frankfurter Zeitung Hails Submarine's Exploit as "Extraordinary Success."

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Monday, May 10.—An Amsterdam dispatch to The Times quotes this editorial in the Frankfurter Zeitung.

"The Lusitania has been sent to the bottom. That is the announcement which must arouse measureless horror among many thousands.

"A giant ship of the British merchant fleet, a vessel of over 31,000 tons, one of the most famous of the fast steamers of the British-American passenger service, a ship full of people, who had little or nothing to do with the war, has been attacked and sunk by a German torpedo. This is the announcement which in a few words indicates a mighty catastrophe to a ship with 2,000 people aboard.

"We always feel that it is tragic and all too hard when war inflicts wounds on those who do not carry its weapons.

"We lament similarly the fate of the unfortunate villages and towns where war rages and the innocent victims of bombs who, far behind the trenches, and often without our being able to estimate the meaning of this murder, are snatched from the ranks of the unarmed.

"Much more terrible is the fate of those who on the high sea, many hundreds in number, suddenly see death before their eyes.

"A German war vessel has sunk the ship. It has done its duty.

"For the German Navy the sinking of the Lusitania means an extraordinary success. Its destruction demolished the last fable with which the people of England consoled themselves; on which hostile shipping relied when it dared to defy the German warnings.

"We do not need to seek grounds to justify the destruction of a British ship. She belonged to the enemy and brought us harm. She has fallen to our shots.

"The enemy and the whole world were warned that he who ventured to trust himself within her staked his life."

LUSITANIA HEROINE IS A GIRL OF 14

Kathleen Kaye Helped Fill a Boat, Pulled an Oar and Coolly Aided Survivors.

QUEENSTOWN, May 9.—The brief time elapsing between the torpedoing and sinking of the Lusitania was enough to develop a heroine in the person of Miss Kathleen Kaye, 14 years old, who was returning from New York, where she had been visiting relatives.

With smiling words and reassurances she aided stewards in filling a boat with women and children. When all were in she climbed aboard the lifeboat as coolly as an able seaman. One sailor fainted at his oar as a result of a hard race to escape swamping. The girl took his place and rowed until the boat was out of danger.

News among the survivors bears as little sign of her terrible experiences as Miss Kaye, who stands [illegible] comforting [illegible]

Hope Abandoned for Those Now Missing—Many Tell How They Escaped Death.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, May 9.—Two survivors of the Lusitania disaster have given testimony that Alfred G. Vanderbilt died heroically; that he went to death to save the life of a woman.

Thomas Slidel, a friend of Mr. Vanderbilt, who lives at the Knickerbocker Club in New York and was traveling with him, told of the sacrifice first. Then tonight Norman Ratcliffe, who lives in Gillingham, Kent, and was returning from Japan, offered verification. Mr. Ratcliffe was rescued, after clinging to a box in the sea for three hours. With him was a steward of the Lusitania.

"This steward," Mr. Ratcliffe said, "told me he had seen Mr. Vanderbilt on the Lusitania's deck, shortly after the ship was struck, with a life belt about his body. When the ship gave every indication that it would sink within a few minutes, the steward said, Mr. Vanderbilt took off his life belt and gave it to a woman who passed him on the deck, trembling with fear of the fate she expected to meet. The steward said Mr. Vanderbilt turned back, as though to look for another belt, and he saw him no more."

Vanderbilt's Last Moments.

Telling of his last moments on the ship and his last sight of Mr. Vanderbilt, Mr. Slidell said:

"I saw Alfred G. Vanderbilt only a few minutes before I left the ship. He was standing with a lifebelt in his hand. A woman came up to him, and I saw him place the belt around the woman. He had none for himself, and I know that he could not swim.

"Only the day before we had been talking of a day and a dawn some years ago when we went down the bay at New York in his yacht and waited to welcome and dip our flag to the Lusitania on her maiden voyage. We saw the first and last of her. Vanderbilt, who had given largely to the Red Cross, was returning to England in order to offer a fleet of wagons and himself as driver to the Red Cross Society, for he said he felt every day that he was not doing enough."

Frohman's Face Calm in Death.

Oliver O. Bernard, scenic artist of Covent Garden, said:

"Only one or two of the shining marks which disasters at sea seem invariably to involve have lived to tell the Lusitania's tale. Vanderbilt the sportsman is gone. Genial Charles Klein the playwright is gone. That erratic American literary genius, Elbert Hubbard, is gone, and with him a wife to whom he seemed particularly devoted. And Charles Frohman is gone.

"Frohman's was the only body I could recognize in the Queenstown mortuary, and perhaps it will interest his many friends in London and New York to know that the famous manager's face in death gives uncommonly convincing evidence that he died without a struggle. It wears a serenely peaceful look.

"Frohman must have found it more difficult for him to take his place in a lifeboat than any other man on the ship. He was quite lame, and hobbled about on deck laboriously with a heavy cane. He seldom came to the general dining saloon, either out of sensitiveness or because of distress caused by his leg.

"I last saw Alfred G. Vanderbilt standing at the port entrance to the grand saloon. He stood there the personification of sportsmanlike coolness. In his right hand was grasped what looked to me like a large purple leather jewel case. It may have belonged to Lady Mackworth, as Mr. Vanderbilt had been much in company of the Thomas party during the trip, and evidently had volunteered to do Lady Mackworth the service of saving her gems for her. Mr. Vanderbilt was absolutely unperturbed. In my eyes, he was the figure of a gentleman waiting unconcernedly for a train. He had on a dark striped suit, and was without cap or other head covering."

734 HAVE BEEN SAVED, CUNARD LINE SAYS

Announces That 144 Bodies Have Been Recovered—Loss May Drop to 1,154.

The Cunard Steamship Company last night announced the receipt of the following cablegram from Liverpool:

"Up to midnight Queenstown advises total number of survivors 764, including 462 passengers and 302 crew.

[If this report is correct and the total on board 1,918, the number of dead is cut to 1,154.]

"One hundred and forty-four bodies recovered, of which 87 identified and 57 unidentified. Identified bodies comprise 65 passengers 22 crew.

"Number of persons injured, 30 passengers and 17 crew."

The Day at Queenstown.

QUEENSTOWN, May 9.—Twenty-three miles from this port as the crow flies, an irregular smear of flotsam on a calm sea marks the grave of the Cunarder Lusitania, the first transatlantic liner sunk by a German submarine. One hundred and forty-nine of the 1,273 persons who perished with her lie in improvised [illegible] in an old building bordering [illegible] town Harbor. They [illegible] placed at rest or [illegible] landing.

[The estimate of the dead is based on the statement that the liner carried 1,918 passengers and crew. Reports from London that she carried 2,160 are believed to be based on a wrong impression that she carried all of the Cameronia steerage passengers when that liner's sailing was suspended. All of them were not taken.]

The 645 survivors here are quartered in hotels, residences, and hospitals, some too badly hurt to be moved. The injuries of some are so serious that additional deaths are expected, and nearly all are too dazed to understand fully what has happened.

Captains Miller and Cassel, Attachés of the American Embassy in London, arrived here this afternoon and conferred with Consul Frost.

Little Hope for More Survivors.

Most of the survivors were leaving Queenstown today. There is little hope here that additional survivors will be found. A tender cruised about the scene of the disaster all last night, but reports today that no bodies had been found. The search, however, will be continued.

D. A. Thomas, the great Welsh coal owner, left here this afternoon for Cardiff, with his daughter, Lady Mackworth, who is still very ill as a result of three hours spent in the water. Mr. Thomas declined to relate his experiences, saying that he had too easy a time to be interesting.

Just as a boat was being lowered on the starboard side an officer ordered him to take a vacant seat. This boat got away without any trouble and was one of the first to be picked up.

Mr. Thomas assisted in every way those who were endeavoring to locate the missing American passengers. He said that as a result of his investigations he was convinced that more than 60 per cent. of the American passengers perished.

Lady Mackworth will be accompanied across the Channel by Dr. Howard L. Fisher of New York, who is being warmly praised for his work among the sick and wounded survivors, he himself having been in the water for three hours before he was rescued.

No passengers could be found who had seen a submarine after the torpedoes were fired.

All the American dead have been laid out together, the bodies draped with American flags, by order of the American Consul.

The body of Mrs. R. D. Shymer of Chicago and New York was identified this afternoon.

Representatives of the Pearson family today claimed the body of Dr. F. S. Pearson. They also visited the morgues, searching for the body of Mrs. Pearson, who is missing.

Marine Superintendent Dodd of the Cunard Line declared today that he had little hope that any survivors would turn up at isolated parts along the coast. He believed that the death list would remain about the same as had been estimated. The only problem now was to identify some of the

QUESTION OF BOAT ORDERS

Some Say He Ordered That None be Lowered, Even After First Torpedo—Perhaps Misunderstood.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Monday, May 10.—Survivors of the Lusitania arriving in London yesterday from Queenstown told some of their tragic experiences to THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent.

They forcibly expressed the opinion that the Lusitania was badly handled in being run [illegible] known submarines were waiting. Although not for a moment attempting to shift the blame from the "murderous Germans" for the sinking of a [illegible] passenger steamer, they insisted that the officers of the steamship, knowing that submarines were lurking off the Irish coast, ought to have taken a different path to avoid all danger.

The criticisms of the 100 survivors among whom were fifty Americans were in main as follows:

First—That the Lusitania steered straight into the way of the submarines by Captain Turner not running the ship in a more southerly course as he approached the Channel.

Second—That instead of the Lusitania being speeded at the top speed of 25 knots an hour she slackened speed on nearing the Irish coast, thus allowing the submarines more time to do their deadly work, her speed at the time she was torpedoed being estimated by the passengers at approximately 15 knots an hour. [Statements have been made on good authority in New York that the after section of the Lusitania's boilers were shut down and that consequently she could not make over 22 knots or in a brief spurt 23 knots.]

Third—That despite the knowledge of the proximity of submarines, which had been seen off the Irish coast twenty-four hours before, no convoy was given the Lusitania.

Fourth—That the Lusitania's officers were apparently oblivious to the contingency of a submarine attack in failing to have the passengers drilled, the officers being accused of giving no heed to passengers' suggestions that a drill was needed so as to know what to do in the event the vessel was torpedoed.

Upon the points of criticism thus raised by the survivors the American Embassy is conducting an investigation through its two military Captains who were dispatched yesterday to Queenstown. Although it is admitted that the outcome of the inquiry will in no way affect the responsibility of neutrals, the investigation will embrace all the facts.

Two trainloads of the survivors arrived at Euston Station at 7 o'clock in the morning and another at noon at Paddington. Bedraggled and weary they came from the trains, many of them wearing ill-fitting clothes which were given them at Queenstown in the rescue.

Ambassador Page met at Euston Station when the first train came in. He had been up nearly all night. He offered aid to all the Americans who arrived, but none needed further help than had been given by the American Consul at Queenstown.

There was not a passenger among the men and women survivors who plainly showed the physical effects of their harrowing experiences. Nearly all had been in the water from one to three hours.

A throng of nearly 200 sightseers or reporters waited at Euston and Paddington Stations to interview survivors or ask about loved ones of whom no word had yet come.

The scenes at both stations were [illegible] in the extreme. [illegible]

Many men survivors brought along the life preservers they wore when the Lusitania sank. The preservers were wrapped in brown paper or steamer rugs.

Kessler Talked with Captain.

George A. Kessler of New York, in an interview, gave some pertinent facts on the question of drill and the ship's speed, telling of talks with the Purser and Captain Turner. Mr. Kessler said:

"On Wednesday I saw the crew taking tarpaulins from the boats and I went up to the Purser and said:

"'It's all right drilling your crew, but why don't you drill your passengers?'

The Purser said he thought it was a good idea, and added, 'Why not tell Captain Turner, Sir?'

"The next day I had a conversation with the Captain, and to him suggested that the passengers should receive tickets, each with a number denoting the number of the boat he should make for in case anything untoward happened. I added that this detail would minimize difficulties in the event of trouble.

"The Captain replied that this suggestion was made after the disaster to the Titanic. The Cunard people had thought it over and considered it impracticable. He added that, of course, he could not act on the advice given, because he should first have the authority of the Board of Trade.

"I talked with the Captain generally about the torpedo scare, which neither of us regarded as of any moment. The Captain (you understand, of course, that we were smoking and chatting) explained his plans to me. He said that they were then slowing down, (in fact, we were going only about 18 knots,) and that the ship would be slowed down until they got somewhere further on the voyage, and then they would go at all speed and get over the war zone.

"I asked him what the war zone was, and he said 500 miles from Liverpool.

Going 18 Knots When Struck.

According to the next day's run, about two hours before the [illegible] occurred, we were about 380 or 390 miles from Liverpool. So we were in the war zone, and we were making a speed of 18 knots at the critical moment.

"For the two days previous, as well as I remember, the mileage was 506 and 501, and on Thursday the mileage was 480. On Friday I was playing [illegible] when the pool was put up on the day's run, and I heard twenty numbers go from 480 to 499. I thought it would be a grand speculation to buy the lowest number, as we were going so slow. I did buy it, and paid $100. The amount in the pool was between $300 and $350, and when the pool was declared, I was the winner.

"The steward offered to hand over the money if I would go to his cabin, but I said that he could pay me later.

"Shortly after the steward had left [illegible] and looked out to sea. I saw all at once the wash of a torpedo, indicated by a snakelike churn of the surface of the water. It may have been about thirty feet away. And then came a thud."

Mr. Kessler told of the general rush for the deck and the second explosion. Then he continued:

"Mr. Berth and his wife, from New York, first-class passengers, were the last ones I spoke to. I should say that all the passengers in the dining saloon had come up on deck. The upper deck was crowded, and, of course, the passengers were wondering what was the matter, few really believing what it proved to be. Still they began to lower boats, and then things began to happen very quickly.

"Mr. Berth was trying to persuade his wife to get into a boat. She said she would not do so without him. He said, 'Oh, come along, my darling; I will be all right,' and I added to his persuasions.

Boat Upset by Liner's Keel.

"I saw him help her into the boat with the ropes of the davits. I fell into the same boat, and we were slipped down into the water over the side of the liner, which was bulging out, the list being the other way. The boat struck the water, and after some seconds (it may have been a minute) I looked up and cried out, 'My God, the Lusitania is gone!'

"We saw the entire bulk, which had been almost upright just a few seconds before, suddenly lurch over away from us. Then she seemed to stand upright in the water, and the next instant the keel of the vessel caught the keel of the boat in which we were floating, and we were thrown into the water. There were only about thirty people in the boat, and I should say that all were stokers or third-class passengers. There may have been one or two first-class: I cannot recall who they were.

"When the boat was overturned I sank fifteen or twenty feet. I thought I was gone. However, I had my lifebelt around me, and managed to rise again to the surface. There I floated for possibly ten or fifteen minutes, when I saw and made a grab at a collapsible lifeboat at which other passengers were also grabbing. We managed to get it shipshipe and clamber in. There were eight or nine in the boat, all stokers except one or two third-class passengers.

"It was partly filled with water and in the scramble which occurred the boat was overturned, and once more we were pitched into the water. This occurred, I should say, eight times, the boat usually righting itself. Before we were picked up by the Bluebell six of the party of eight or nine were lying drowned in the bilge water which was [illegible] them."

[illegible] asked what he thought the effect of the sinking would be on the United States, Mr. Kessler answered: "My God! what can America do? [illegible] will bring back these people [illegible] was cold-blooded, deliberate murder, and nothing else—the greatest murder the world has ever known. Will going to war mend that?"

[illegible] question whether the loss of [illegible] That is a very serious question, and I hesitate to give an opinion on matters which are purely technical.

"Still, it seems to me as a landsman, and one who has crossed the ocean a great many times, that the safety of the Lusitania lay in speed. We were in the war zone by 140 or 150 miles, and every moment that we dawdled at 15 or 18 knots was an increase of our risk of being torpedoed.

"Again, (and of course I merely make the comment,) I cannot understand why there were no destroyers or patrol boats about, as we certainly had been led to expect there would be when we reached the war zone.

"The ship was torpedoed at 2:05 P. M. My watch stopped at 2:30. It was 5 o'clock when I was picked up by the Bluebell, and it was 10 o'clock before we were landed in Queenstown.

"I see that it was stated that there were two Vanderbilts on the liner. There was only one—Alfred Vanderbilt. I knew him as a friend. I greatly regret to learn that he has been drowned."

Mr. Jenkins's Strong Views.

Francis Jenkins of New York was one of those who talked emphatically on what he styled the failure of the Lusitania officers to avoid the submarine danger.

"It was outrageous that the Lusitania pushed ahead right into the path of danger," said Mr. Jenkins as he limped from the train at Euston, having been injured when a lifeboat crashed into the side of the steamer as it was lowered.

"It seems to me the Cunard officials did not use judgment to protect the lives of passengers. The utmost confidence, even to the point of boasting, was assumed by the ship's officers on the entire run about the unlikelihood of the ship being torpedoed.

Some of the most prominent passengers went to Captain Turner three days before the Lusitania was sunk, told him there was considerable talk among the passengers about submarines, and asked if it was not advisable to have a boat drill, so the passengers would know how to escape if the ship was torpedoed. The Captain coolly replied that he was not worried about the danger and that he would get the Lusitania into port safely.

"'A torpedo can't get the Lusitania,' said the Captain. 'She runs too fast.'

"The Captain, however, said that he would speak to the first officer about a drill. I don't know if he did speak to the first officer, but I do know that there was no drill. This was commented on by the passengers as we neared the Irish coast on the very day the Lusitania was torpedoed.

"We all marveled, too, that the Lusitania actually cut down her speed as she approached the coast. Every one knew that that was the path of danger, and we fully expected the ship to be speeded to the utmost. Instead, she reduced her speed so much as to make the passengers talk of it. I spoke to one officer, and he replied that there was no chance of a submarine getting the Lusitania, and her speed didn't make any difference. That appeared to me to be a strange attitude to take.

"We were also amazed over the fact that there was no convoy for the ship. The general opinion was that torpedo-boat destroyers would accompany us through the danger zone.

"A few of us suspected shortly after noon that a submarine was after us when the ship gave a sudden turn. We looked for a submarine, but didn't see it. The Lusitania did not quicken her speed.

"I call the management of the Lusitania bad."

Canadian Also Critical.

R. T. Taylor, a hat manufacturer of Montreal, dwelt upon the lack of a convoy as a "mistake." He also spoke of the failure of the Lusitania to go at top speed, saying:

"How the Lusitania's officers can account for letting her creep through waters known to be dangerous is beyond me. It showed, to my mind, a queer lack of the simplest precautions. I fail also to understand why she took the course she did, knowing that submarines had been there the day before.

"Who blundered? The rescued passengers at Queenstown to whom I talked all commented on the Captain daring to run the Lusitania at slow speed and in the course he pursued. Nothing, of course, can shift the blame from Germany for willful murder, but the point I make is that more care should have been exercised by those on whom the lives of the passengers depended."

Britisher Joins In.

A. J. Byington, a rubber merchant of London, returning from Brazil, expressed amazement that the Lusitania maintained comparatively low speed in approaching the Irish coast.

"It looks to me," he said, "as if the Lusitania officials imagined that she was too lucky to be torpedoed. Instead of running 15 or 18 knots an hour, she ought to have been pushed to the limit, as that, we all understood, was the one means of safety upon which she depended.

"Another point which I think ought to be emphasized is that the Germans showed utter disregard for life by not giving time for the passengers to get off.

"No ships of any kind were in sight for ten or fifteen miles. The Germans had it all their own way. They could easily have allowed the Lusitania's passengers ample time to get into lifeboats and row away before shooting their torpedo. There was no opportunity for anything to happen to the submarine if she were delayed. It shows that they didn't care a rap about the loss of life in their murderous work."

Mr. Byington jumped into a lifeboat which was filled with so many passengers that the ropes broke. As the boat fell into the water it capsized, and nearly all in it were drowned. Mr. Byington, who had a life preserver, swam to another boat. This later capsized. Then he got into another boat and helped to row it ashore.

A brave figure among those waiting for the survivors at Euston was Mrs. F. Chatham Stephens of Montreal, daughter of A. E. Kemp, whose father is a financial hero after fighting at the front. Mrs. Stephens went to the station to seek news of her eighteen-month-old child, John, who was being brought on the Lusitania by his grandmother, Mrs. G. W. Stephens of Montreal. Neither the name of the grandmother nor that of the boy is on the list of survivors or dead. The young mother, although distracted by lack of word, kept up courageously.

Describes Ship's Last Agony.

Thomas Slidell of New York tells this story of the sinking of the ship:

"The torpedo hit the vessel almost amidships. A majority of those at luncheon in the saloon arose at once to go to their cabins for lifebelts and other things, but I do not think many of them ever reached the deck, for while they were in the lower part of the ship the second torpedo exploded, and I believe they were killed in their apartments downstairs or were rendered unconscious.

"Those who were not killed must have suffered many minutes of agony, trying to fight their way up to the decks. The companionways were all askew, and in the corridors it was only possible to get along by walking in the angle of the floor and the wall.

"It took me a good many precious minutes to get from my cabin to the deck, and I saw others in worse plight.

"I noticed then how few saloon passengers there were on deck. Somehow it seemed that when it came to rough and tumble flight they were too slow to realize their danger and seize their opportunity. The people who were saved and saved themselves were practical people and those who were physically fit. First-class passengers were also at the disadvantage that their families were scattered all over the vessel on one deck or another, and many lost their lives looking for others instead of seeking their own safety.

"The people behaved admirably. As far as possible, the starboard boats were filled, but the time was terribly short, and every second the Lusitania, like a street of mansions shaken by an earthquake, was falling further and further over on her starboard side. It was impossible to fill boats to capacity. They had to be got away quickly, for the giant funnels of the vessel and her superstructure were coming down nearer and nearer to the water every instant.

"A woman who had just taken her place in a boat looked up and saw those giant gray tubes lowering, and she cried out, 'The funnels, the funnels!' The cry and her fears were not without good reason, for the funnels were surely pressing many to death, inch by inch.

"The ship slipped over and the davits fouled several boats which were not clear, as the monster lay for a moment almost on her side.

"I had slid down a rope into the sea and I struck out, swimming away from the vessel, calling to others near to avoid the stern for fear the aerated water, caused by the churning screws, would prove a death trap, as it did to many.

"When I had got clear, I turned to look at the 'Lucy' in her last agony. I think the engines must have stopped when she was hit, but, going as she is said to have been going, at nineteen knots, water pouring in on her starboard side gave her a pull that way, with the result that she traced a circle of foam on the sea before she sank. First she settled down slightly by the bows and lost speed. Then, quite slowly, but with increasing speed, she began to list till she lay over on her side and still with her nose well down in the water.

"At last, when she was flat, or nearly so, she took another move and reared almost perpendicular, with her stern in the air, as the Titanic is said to have done before she plunged to the bottom."

Amazed to Be Alive.

Lady Allan of Montreal, and her two daughters, all of whom were rescued, were a matter of solace.

"We were warned by the German Government," said he, "and I, for one, do not want any official action by my country."

Cunard Line Chairman Deprecates Premature Criticisms.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, May 9.—In reply to a dispatch informing him of the criticisms made by survivors of the Lusitania, A. A. Booth, Chairman of the Cunard Company, telegraphed to THE NEW YORK TIMES London Office as follows:

LIVERPOOL, May 9.—I shall not attempt to draw any conclusions until all the facts are known, and I therefore deprecate the criticism, which can only be based on assumptions. Meanwhile I can only state that I have completed confidence in Captain Turner's judgment.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Monday, May 10.—A. A. Booth, discussing with The Daily Mail representative the controversy which will arise both as to the protection afforded the Lusitania by war craft and the precautions to prevent the recurrence of such a disaster, said:

"This is a matter which rests exclusively with the Admiralty. It is a matter, moreover, which cannot intelligently be discussed by a layman, especially when he is without the facts. Too many considerations which are obviously beyond our power to measure enter into the question to justify the expression on our part as to ways and means for preventing the repetition of Friday's horror.

"We may rest assured that the Admiralty is doing and will continue to do what it regards as necessary and practicable."

I asked whether any special precautions had been taken by the Admiralty to safeguard the Lusitania against the fate which overtook her, Mr. Booth replied, "We are without knowledge on this point."

LONDON, May 9.—The Lusitania was not in the British Navy list for April among the merchant vessels commissioned as naval auxiliary craft, and the officials of the Cunard Company deny that she ever was used for that purpose.

SAYS TURNER ORDERED NO BOATS BE LOWERED

J. J. Leary Positive But Order May Have Referred Only to Port Side.

QUEENSTOWN, May 9.—"Captain Turner, after the first torpedo was fired and following an examination, declared that the lifeboats should not be lowered, as the ship was in condition to make the Irish coast."

This statement was made today by James J. Leary of Eighth Avenue, Brooklyn, who states that he was standing near the ladder leading to the bridge, and heard the Captain say that the ship was not mortally hurt.

"I was standing with T. B. King, a Director of the firm of Brokaw Brothers, whose body I have just identified," said Mr. Leary, "when I felt the shock from the first torpedo. The Captain ordered an examination.

"On receiving the report, he said in our hearing that he had closed certain bulkheads which would render the ship seaworthy long enough to reach an Irish port, and that, consequently, he would not order the lowering of the boats.

"Captain Turner had barely finished speaking when a second explosion was heard. Within five minutes I was in the sea, fighting to keep my head above the water. I had on a big life preserver, but a piece of wreckage had become fastened to my leg and was dragging me down.

"When my strength was almost exhausted I worked my foot clear and swam to an overturned lifeboat, to the sides of which twenty persons were clinging.

"One by one, weakened by chill and exhaustion and buffeted by the waves, they dropped back into the water to be seen no more, until only six of us were left. We were picked up by a trawler four hours after the ship sank. I do not know how many times I was [illegible]

SHIP'S DISCIPLINE SHARPLY ATTACKED

Dr. Fisher of New York Blames Cunard Line and the Admiralty.

QUEENSTOWN, May 9.—Dr. Howard L. Fisher of New York, who is a brother of Walter L. Fisher, formerly Secretary of the Interior of the United States, and was aboard the Lusitania on his way to Belgium for Red Cross duty, criticised the ship's officers. He said:

"It is not true that those on board were unconcerned over the possibility of being torpedoed. I took the big liner to save time, and also because in case of a floating mine I felt that she would have more chance of staying up. But, like everybody else aboard, I felt sure that in case of being torpedoed we would have ample time to take to the boats.

"I do not know what case is being made out for the Cunard people, but I cannot say that either discipline or precautions were up to the standard.

"When I heard the crash I rushed to the port side. No officer was in sight. An effort was being made to lower the boat swinging just opposite the grand entrance. Women, children, and men made a mad scramble about this boat, which was smashed against the side, throwing all the occupants into the sea.

"Then two big men, one a sailor and the other a passenger, succeeded in launching a second boat. Much to my surprise, this amateur effort was successful. This boat got away, and carried chiefly women and children. This boat was successfully launched on the port side.

"We then saw our first glimpse of an officer, who came along the deck and spoke to Lady Mackworth, Miss Conner, and myself, who were standing in a group. He said: 'Don't worry; the ship will right itself.'

"He had hardly moved on before the ship turned sideways, and then seemed to plunge headforemost into the sea.

"I came up after what seemed to be an interminable time under water and found myself surrounded by swimmers, dead bodies, and wreckage. I got on an upturned yawl, where I found thirty other people, among them Lady Allan, whose collarbone was broken while she was in the water.

"Another passenger on the yawl, a man whose name I did not learn, had his arm hanging by the skin. His injury was probably due to the explosion which followed. This arm was amputated successfully with a butcher's knife by a little Italian surgeon aboard a tramp steamer which picked me up.

"This tramp was flying the Greek flag, hence the report that a Greek steamer was on the scene. It was midnight before I arrived at a hotel in Queenstown. There I found neither dry clothing nor a bed, but was compelled to sleep on the floor of the hotel parlor."

Speaking with considerable bitterness, Dr. Fisher concluded:

"I do not see how the Cunard Company or the Admiralty can hold themselves free from blame for this tragedy. The authorities allowed a great ship, loaded with a valuable cargo, to proceed through known dangerous waters without a single torpedo boat as a convoy."

Dr. Fisher added that he knew that most of passengers were below at food.

The affidavit of Mrs. Smith is as follows:

Was first-class passenger Lusitania on Friday, May 7. Was in reading room about 2 P. M., when board noise and ship seemed to lift. Shortly afterward another explosion occurred.

Went toward my state room. Was told not to hurry, as there was no danger. Had beforehand got lifebelt ready in cabin. Now put it on and went upper deck.

Steward helped me into boat, hanging in davits. Between forty and fifty people got in. Boat was lowered and we pushed off. Rescued two ladies and one man from water.

I did not actually see ship sinking. Rowed away, and were taken in tow fishing boat, and afterward transferred to patrol boat, which landed us Queenstown 8:10.

Was met on wharf by Consul, who took me Consulate, and then placed me with Mrs. Townsend, American lady of Scranton, from whom and husband have experienced much kindness. Did not see submarine.

Perhaps Order Was for Port Side.

LIVERPOOL, May 9.—A. J. Mitchell of Toronto was in the storeroom of the Lusitania when the torpedo struck the ship. He ran out and assisted two children and Mrs. Ellen Hogg of New York into a boat and then got into the boat himself. He said:

"I heard an order from the bridge not to lower the boats on the port side, where the ship was high out of the water. This was misunderstood to mean that no boats were to be lowered, and several valuable moments were lost."

LONDON, May 9.—Dr. J. T. Houghton of Troy, N. Y., stated that when the first torpedo struck the ship an officer of the vessel told him there was no danger and that the Lusitania would be headed for Queenstown and beached there. Meanwhile, the officer said, the boats were being got ready for an emergency.

"Then," continued Dr. Houghton, "the big liner was hit again, this time forward of the main bridge, the first torpedo having struck her amidships. The second attack was more deadly than the first, as quite suddenly the steamer began to settle by the head.

"Orders quickly came from the bridge to lower all the boats, and the work was at once begun. Women and children, who were terror-stricken, were rushed into the boats, but, as some of them were not lowered successfully, many of the occupants were thrown into the water."

A press dispatch from Dublin quotes James Brooks, an American passenger, as saying there:

"I heard the Captain order that no more boats be launched, so I leaped into the sea. After I reached the water there was another explosion, which sent up a shower of wreckage."

Isaac Jackson of Paterson, N. J., described the difficulty experienced in the attempts to get out the boats from the steamer. He stated that when the people got into the boats to await events officers ordered them out, telling them there was no danger.

"So we got out and stood talking and waiting until the ship went down," said Mr. Jackson. "I think that as she had ceased to heel over beyond a certain point the officers thought she would keep afloat."

INQUIRY ORDERED BY BOARD OF TRADE

Lord Mersey to Preside at Investigation—Officials Silent as to Catastrophe.

LONDON, May 8.—It is officially announced that the British Board of Trade, with the concurrence of the Admiralty, has ordered an inquiry into the circumstances attending the loss of the Lusitania.

Lord Mersey has consented to conduct the inquiry.

Pending the inquiry official opinion as to how the Lusitania came to be caught, and why so many lives were lost, remains a secret. The general unofficial opinion is that several submarines were assigned to the task of attacking the liner, and that they manoeuvred her into a position where she could not escape.

Passengers say that for some time before the first torpedo was fired the Lusitania had altered her course, and they ascribe this to the fact that one of the German submarines had shown herself, sending the big liner in the direction where other underwater craft were waiting to strike with their torpedoes.

These submarines, naval experts think, are of the latest type, with a displacement of probably 1,400 tons. They are much more powerful than any possessed by other navies.

Lord Mersey conducted the investigations into the sinking of the steamers Titanic and the Empress of Ireland.

TWO YOUNG WOMEN LIVE

Traveling Companions Saved by Boats After Giving Up Hope of Rescue.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CORK, May 9, (Dispatch to The London Daily Chronicle.)—This morning I had a talk with two young women who traveled from New York on the Lusitania and were rescued at the last moment almost by a miracle. Their experiences may be taken as a sample of what hundreds of other women had to endure on that fatal Friday afternoon.

The young women, Miss Barrett and Miss Macdonald, were traveling together in the second-class cabin. Miss Macdonald was floating about for three and a half hours before she was picked up, and this morning she had hardly recovered from the effects of her terrible experiences.

Miss Barrett, who carries a bold spirit in a slight frame, was able to give a perfectly connected and vivid account of what happened. She said:

"We had gone into the second saloon and were just finishing lunch. I heard a sound something like the smashing of big dishes, and then there came a second and a louder crash. Miss Macdonald and I started to go upstairs, but we were thrown back by the crowd. Then the ship stopped, and we managed to get up to the second deck, where we found sailors trying to lower the boats.

"There was no panic, and the ship's officers and crew went about their work quietly and steadily. I went to get two life belts, but a gentleman standing by told us to remain where we were and he would fetch them for us. He brought us two life belts and we put them on.

"By this time the ship was leaning right over to starboard, and we were both thrown down. We managed to scramble to the side of the liner. Near us I saw a rope attached to one of the lifeboats and I thought I could catch it. So we murmured a few words of prayer and then jumped into the water. I missed the rope, but floated about in the water some time.

"I did not lose consciousness at first, but the water got into my eyes and mouth and I began to lose hope of ever seeing my friends again. I could not see anybody near me, and then I must have lost consciousness, for I remember nothing more until one of the Lusitania's lifeboats came along. The crew were pulling on board a woman who was unconscious, and they shouted to me, 'You hold on a little longer.' After a time they lifted me out of the water, and then I remember nothing more for a time that seemed to be an age.

"In the meantime our boat had picked up twenty others, and when I became conscious it was getting late in the evening. We were transferred to the trawler and taken to Queenstown.

"Miss Macdonald told me how she floated about nearly four hours in a dazed state. She had little remembrance of what passed until a boat saved her. She remembered somebody saying, 'Oh, the poor girl is dead.' She had just strength to raise her hand and they returned and pulled her on board."

RESCUED AMERICANS TESTIFY BY AFFIDAVITS

Robert Rankin Asserts One Torpedo Caused Boiler to Explode —No Warning Given.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, May 9.—Consul Frost tonight sent to the State Department extracts from affidavits obtained by him today at Queenstown from Mrs. Jessie Taft Smith and Robert Rankin, two of the American survivors of the Lusitania.

The affidavit of Rankin, who stated that the torpedo was fired without warning, follows:

At 12 noon ship [illegible] course off Irish coast. Walked deck until 1:30. Went to lunch 20 minutes. Arrived rear starboard A deck about 2 o'clock ship's time of night before.

At exactly 2:10 P. M. one of our group of four sighted submarine's low black ridge about quarter a mile starboard bow. Lusitania going slow all morning, had been blowing fog horn till about 10 A. M., and was steaming about 15 knots.

Torpedo left submarine almost instantly and traveled rapidly toward boat, leaving white trail. Struck ship not far from a line below bridge and through boiler room. Explosion tore upward through deck, destroying part of forward lifeboat. A boiler exploded immediately. No second torpedo.

Boat listed immediately and began to fill through open ports and hole caused by explosion. Ship sank 2:33 by watch of passenger who jumped into sea.

MOST WOMEN CALM IN FACE OF DEATH

Hundreds of Persons Left Struggling in Water After Lusitania Went Down.

SHIP'S BOILERS EXPLODED

Survivors Tell Thrilling Stories of the Great Sea Tragedy as They Saw It.

LONDON, Monday, May 10.—Many of the survivors of the Lusitania, arriving in London yesterday, gave thrilling stories of the disaster.

Oliver P. Bernard, scenic artist of Covent Garden Theatre, who was returning from a business trip to the United States, said:

"I think I can say that I was one of the few people who really saw a torpedo discharged at the Lusitania. Coming on deck from the dining saloon, I was leaning against the starboard rail of the ship when I saw the periscope of a submarine about two hundred yards away. Then I noticed a long, white streak of foam. It gave me the impression of frothy fizzing in water. Almost immediately there was a terrific impact, followed by an explosion.

"The Lusitania was going at fifteen knots at the time. The shot was perfectly aimed at the boat, and when it struck, debris, dust, and water were thrown up in a dense column through the entire superstructure of the vessel about the bridge. A hundred must have been blown to atoms, including trimmers and stokers, to say nothing of men and women in the forward cabins, who were about to come on deck.

"A few moments after the explosion the vessel toppled over, as if she were in drydock and some of the underpinning on the starboard side had been knocked away.

Women Acted Bravely.

"There was a frantic rush from the starboard entrances to the port side and from below. Women were shouting, 'What shall we do?' They knew well what had happened, as the chance of being torpedoed was discussed every day. I heard nothing else on the voyage.

"There was no great excitement, in the real sense of the word. Most of the women tried hard to keep cool, and except for occasional screams of 'Where is my husband?' 'Where is my child?' they acted bravely. I noticed more people going below than coming on deck after the explosion.

"The wireless operators were still sending out calls from their emergency apparatus, the main wireless room having been disorganized. The ship was now listing badly to starboard, and, taking a swivel chair which an operator offered me, I slid down into the water and to a boat, which was still attached to the davits and was partially covered with water. We cleared the boat not a moment too soon, for we had hardly done so when the liner went down on the starboard side, one of the funnels grazing our heads.

"In the twinkling of an eye the monster vessel disappeared amid the cries of those who had been caught.

"It was one long, indescribable scene of agony. There was floating debris on all sides, and men and women and children clinging for dear life to deck chairs and rafts which littered the water. Many were entangled in wreckage, and one by one they seemed to fall off and give themselves up."

James Brooks, of New York, said:

"All the boats had been swung out the day before and the work of launching them was at once begun. The attempt in the case of the first boat was a tragic failure. Women and children were taken first, and the boat was filled with them, except for men who could row. The boat was lowered until within its own length of the water, when the forward tackle jammed, and its occupants, with the exception of three, were thrown into the sea.

"On the decks of the doomed vessel absolute calmness prevailed. There was no rushing about and nothing resembling a panic. In a few isolated cases there were signs of hysteria on the part of women, but that was all. I did not notice any concerted efforted to distribute lifebelts, and I was unable to obtain one.

Difficult to Get Out Boats.

"The efforts made to lower the boats had not apparently met with much success. Those on the port side had swung inward and could not be used, while the collapsible boats, lashed between them, could not be reached.

"Women were standing quite calmly, waiting for an opportunity to enter the boats when they should be released by the men from the davits. The davits, by this time, were touching the water, the ship having sunk so low. The bridge deck was only four feet or so from the surface of the sea.

"Losing no time, the men passed the women rapidly into the boats, places having been found for all the people about the midship section. I stepped into one of the lifeboats and attempted to assist in getting it free. I saw that the fist was so great that the davits pinched the gear, rendering it impossible for us to get away before the ship went down. So I dived into the water.

"I swam as hard as I could, and noticed with feelings of apprehension the menacing bulk of the huge funnels as they loomed over my head. I expected them momentarily to fall and crush me, but at last I judged myself to be clear.

"I turned around to watch the great ship heel over. The monster took a sudden plunge, and I saw a crowd still on her decks and boats filled with helpless women and children glued to her side. I sickened with horror at the sight.

"There was a thunderous roar, as of the collapse of a great building on fire; then she disappeared, dragging with her hundreds of fellow-creatures into the vortex. Many never rose to the surface, but the sea rapidly grew black with the figures of struggling men and women and children."

Mr. Brooks, with Charles Lauriat of Boston and three other men, managed to get into a collapsible boat which was adrift closed. They saved thirty people, picked up five oars from the sea and rowed toward the lighthouse. The only craft in sight was a trawler, which was handicapped by the light wind, but when she reached the scene she picked up more than a hundred of those struggling in the water or drifting about. She was so crowded that some had to sit with legs dangling over the sides.

Dr. Carl E. Foss of Montana, who leaped into the sea when the Lusitania was going down and was picked up by a boat, said he saw women and children jumping overboard from the stricken steamer. He rescued several of them, he stated, and revived many of them.

Thinks Boilers Exploded.

"As the Lusitania took her final plunge," Dr. Foss said, "I think her boilers must have exploded, because an immense amount of steam and smoke came from the vessel. As she finally disappeared I noticed several boats still hanging on her sides, attached to the blocks.

"On the whole, there was more disturbance among the crew than among the passengers.

"An hour before the catastrophe I was on deck. I noticed that the ship was being swung about and saw something about a quarter of a mile distant which looked like a submarine. We were going slowly, probably at half or two-thirds of the speed which we had maintained on the other part of the voyage. There was some fog earlier in the day, and I believed the Captain of the steamer thought his vessel was safe, as the foghorn was being blown. It is my impression that two or more submarines attacked the Lusitania."

Charles T. Jeffery of Kenosha, Wis., ascribed his escape to an inflatable life jacket he was wearing. Mr. Jeffery said he went down with the ship and that when he came up he was surrounded by hundreds of persons making desperate efforts in the water to grab something which would keep them afloat.

E. M. Collis of Chicago said he jumped into the sea and clung to a log for two hours before he was picked up.

E. J. Milford of Maryland was dragged into a boat after swimming for fifty minutes.

Mrs. Patrick Wilson of Montreal was lowered in a boat, which was swamped and sank. Supported only by a life belt, she remained afloat for three hours, and was finally rescued.

Buried Her Baby at Sea.

Mrs. Rose Lohden and her daughter of Toronto tell a pathetic story of two English women who were rescued by the boat in which the Lohdens left the steamer.

One woman had buried her baby at sea. The other, with an infant held tightly to her breast, on being taken from the sea into the boat, looked for a moment at the child's face, and then said, "Let me bury my baby," at the same time placing the body in the water.

Vincente Egana, a young Spaniard, saved innumerable women, Mrs. Lohden says, before the ship went down. He carried them to boats, and, standing beside Captain Turner, went down with the steamer, being later picked up in the water.

One of the steerage passengers arriving here had a parrot which had perched on his shoulder when he climbed into a lifeboat.

PASSENGERS TOO CONFIDENT.

Steward Compares Experience with That on the Titanic.

LIVERPOOL, May 9.—Percy Penny, a steward on the Lusitania, says the list of the vessel after she was struck made it impossible for the men to get to their boat stations. All they could do was to attend to boats on the port side, into which they helped all the women and children they could.

"There was no panic and little excitement," said Penny today. "The shock was so sudden and so great that the people scarcely had time to learn what had happened. The same sort of confidence which made the Titanic's passengers prefer sticking to the ship to taking to the boats was apparent. There appeared to be an idea among the passengers that the Lusitania would not sink.

"So fast did the water rise that before the last boat was launched the water was level with the boat deck, and people simply stepped into the boat. I walked into the sea and was drawn down by the vortex of the sinking steamer, but came up again."

LONG BATTLE IN THE WATER

Surgeon's Vivid Description of Death Cries of Drowning—S. M. Knox's Graphic Story.

Dr. DANIEL V. MOORE, (Yankton, S. D.)

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

QUEENSTOWN, May 8.—After the explosion quiet and order were soon accomplished by assurances from the stewards. I proceeded to the deck promenade for observation and saw only that the ship was fast leaning to starboard. I hurried toward my cabin below for a lifebelt and turned back because of the difficulty in keeping upright. I struggled to D deck and forward to the first-class cabin, where I saw a Catholic priest.

I could find no belts and returned again toward E deck and saw a stewardess struggling to dislodge a belt. I helped her with hers and secured one for myself. I then rushed to D deck and noticed one woman perched on the gunwale, watching a lowering lifeboat ten feet away. I pushed her down and into the boat, then jumped in. The stern of the lifeboat continued to lower, but the bow stuck fast. A stoker cut the bow ropes with a hatchet, and we dropped in a vertical position.

Rescues Girl Singer.

A girl whom we had heard sing at a concert was struggling and I caught her by the ankle and pulled her in. A man I grasped by the shoulders and I landed him safe. He was the barber of the first-class cabin, and a more manly man I never met. He showed his courage and his will later on.

We pushed away hard to avoid the suck, but our boat was fast filling and we bailed fast with one bucket and the women's hats. The man with the bucket became exhausted and I relieved him. In a few minutes she was filled level full. Then a keg floated up and I pitched it about ten feet away and followed it. After reaching it I turned to see the fate of our boat. She had capsized and covered many. Now a young steward, Freeman, by name, had approached me, clinging to a deck chair. I urged him to grab the other side of the keg several times. He grew faint, but harsh speaking roused him. Once he said: "I am going to go," but I ridiculed this and it gave him strength. By stroking with our legs we succeeded in reaching a raft.

Splints a Boy's Leg.

We were in the water about one hour and a half. At this time I suffered from violent vomiting. Then followed appalling chills, but by beating myself I restored my energy and was soon handling an oar. Freeman collapsed, but recovered after reaching the patrol boat Brock. There were about twenty-three persons on the raft. They worked nobly in picking five of us up after what seemed an eternity.

The good boat Brock and her splendid officers and men took us aboard. I went to the engine room and stripped to the skin. Here and in the room above I cared for men and women as they were rescued. Little ten-year-old Frank Hook had his left thigh bone fractured. This I reduced and splinted, and in a short while Frank asked, "Is there a funny paper on the boat?"

Sardonic Smile of Death.

At the scene of the catastrophe the surface of the water seemed dotted with bodies. Only a few of the lifeboats seemed to be doing any good. The cries of "My God!" "Save us!" and "Help!" gradually grew weaker from all sides and finally a low weeping, wailing, inarticulate sound, mingled with coughing and gurgling, made me heartsick. I saw many men die. Some appeared to be sleepy and worn out just before they went down, others grew gradually blue and an air of hunger gave their features a sardonic smile.

There was no suction when the ship settled. She went down steadily and at the best possible angle. The lifeboats were not in order and they were not manned. Most of the people rushed to the upper decks.

I did not hear a second explosion. There is no more horrible or pitiable sight possible than the sight of the faces of mothers and babies and girls here in the morgues.

Saved by Miracle.

Weighing all the facts soberly convinces me that it was only through the mercy of God that any one was saved. I sailed from America that I might offer my services as a surgeon. I have visited the Valley of Death and am heartsick. My concern now is for my dear mother at Yankton. The cable seems overburdened. I could rest if I knew she knew I was safe. After this escape it seems proper that I should return. Is there any bounds to this modern vandalism? Must the entire world be outraged before it raises a hand to rebuke and punish the most despicable trait observed in mankind?

CARRIED DOWN BY FUNNEL.

Samuel M. Knox of Philadelphia Tells Thrilling Story of Escape.

By SAMUEL M. KNOX, (Philadelphia.)

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

QUEENSTOWN, May 9.—Shortly after 2 o'clock on Friday, while we were finishing luncheon on board the Lusitania, in a calm sea, a heavy concussion was felt on the starboard side, throwing the vessel to port. She immediately swung back, and proceeded to take on a list to starboard, which rapidly increased.

The passengers rapidly, but in good form, left the dining room, proceeding mostly to A deck, or the boat deck. There preparations were being made to launch the boats. Order among the passengers was well maintained, there being nothing approaching a panic. Many of the passengers had gone to their stations and provided themselves with lifebelts.

The vessel reached an angle of about 24 degrees, and at this point there seemed to be a cessation in the listing, the vessel maintaining this position for four or five minutes, when something apparently gave way and the list started anew and increased rapidly, until in the end the greater number of the passengers were congregated on the high side of the ship. When it became apparent that she was going to sink, I made my way to the lower, or port, side, where there appeared to be several boats only partly filled and no passengers on that deck.

At this juncture I found the outside of the boat deck practically even with the water, and the ship was even further down by the head. I stepped into a boat, and a sailor in charge then attempted to cast her off, but it was found that the boat falls had fouled the boat, and she could not be released in the limited time available.

I went overboard at once and attempted to get clear of the ship, which was coming over slowly. I was caught by one of the smokestacks and carried down a considerable distance before being released. On coming to the surface I floated about for a considerable time, when I was picked up by a life raft. This raft, with others, had floated free when the vessel sank, and had been picked up and taken in charge by Mr. Gauntlett of Washington and Mr. Lauriatt of Boston, who picked up thirty-two persons in all. It was equipped with oars, and we made our way to a fishing smack about five miles distant, which took us on board, although it was already overloaded. We were all finally taken off this boat by the Cunard tender Flying Fish and brought to Queenstown, arriving at 9:30 o'clock.

107 AMERICANS LOST AND 81 WERE SAVED

Consul at Queenstown and Ambassador Page Show the Fate of Those on Lusitania.

23 BODIES ARE IDENTIFIED

Leaving 84, Including Several Prominent Men Who Are Missing and Given Up for Dead.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, May 9.—Latest available official information indicates that 107 Americans lost their lives in the Lusitania tragedy and that only 81 were saved. There are 23 American identified dead and 84 Americans missing and almost certainly dead, according to the best information obtainable by Wesley Frost, the American Consul at Queenstown, Ireland, and Ambassador Page at London. All but about 15 of the American survivors started from Queenstown for London on Saturday night.

Hope for the safety of Americans not mentioned in the lists sent by Consul Frost has been virtually abandoned. The State Department tonight received a message from the Consul which asked the Government to "assume that persons not listed as either survivors or identified dead are missing and almost certainly dead."

This list of missing and "almost certainly dead" includes the prominent American passengers whose names have not been cabled by the Consul. Mr. Frost informed Secretary Bryan that no news whatever had been obtained concerning the following, and that none of their bodies had been recovered: Alfred Gwynne Vanderbilt of New York, Herbert S. Stone of New York, Victor F. Shields of Cincinnati, Herman A. Myers of New York, Mr. and Mrs. Elbert Hubbard of East Aurora, N. Y., and Justus Miles Forman of New York.

Consul Frost notified the department that he expected to procure affidavits today from Major F. Warren Pearl of New York and from Mrs. Jessie Taft Smith of Braceville, Ohio. From this it is inferred that Major Pearl and the members of his family who were rescued did not accompany the main party of Americans which started last night from Queenstown for London. Up to 8 o'clock tonight only two messages came from Consul Frost to the State Department. The first, received at 2:28 o'clock this morning, and sent from Queenstown at midnight, checked up the total of American survivors enumerated in his previous lists, saying the total was then 68. This message added another survivor, and a later message added the names of nine other survivors, bringing the total American survivors up to 78.

The first cablegram from Consul Frost at Queenstown, received at 2:28 o'clock this morning, read as follows:

By securing passenger list from Cunard, N. Y., showing nationalities and deleting the sixty-eight names American survivors sent by me the loss of American life can be established. Cunard here cannot say how many Americans were on Lusitania. As to identified dead we have only twenty-two partly dubious. To previous list of corpses add Hugh Compton, J. B. Turnbull, Edward Ellis, W. Walker. Most Americans have now. Saturday midnight, proceeded, perhaps fifteen remaining. Will procure narrative affidavits from Major Pearl and Mrs. Jessie Taft Smith Sunday. Add to survivors Mrs. A. C. Billicke.

FROST, American Consul.

The second cablegram from Consul Frost, at Queenstown, received at the State Department at 7:40 o'clock tonight read as follows:

Please assume that persons not listed as either survivors or identified dead are missing and almost certainly dead. No news of Vanderbilt, Stone, Shields, Myers, Klein, Hubbard, Forman, &c., nor of their bodies. Add following survivors: May Maycock, Yvlet Henderson, Huntley Henderson, Mary Barrett, J. Lehmann, Mrs. Erhart, Mrs. Pye, Mrs. Sam Sharp, and Kitty McDonnell. Some of these are probably Canadians. Add C. J. Broderick to identified dead. Rough weather has prevented recovering bodies.

FROST, American Consul.

Consul Frost's reference to "partly dubious" identifications, it is assumed, means two names embraced in the list, those of Robert Buswine and Miss Mary Grunston.

DRAPE KAISER'S GIFT.

Harvard Students Commemorate the "Lusitania Massacre."

Special to The New York Times.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., May 9.—Harvard's Brunswick lion, a gift from the German Kaiser, was found this morning draped in mourning. A large sheet was wound around the statue, which stands in front of the Germanic Museum, the edges of the sheet being black. Two inscriptions were scrawled on the cover-ing in large bold letters. One of them read:

"One hundred and forty-seven corpses. Another gift from the Kaiser."

The other was:

"In memory of the Lustiania massacre," and was signed "Humanity."

The draping was said to be the work of undergraduates as a protest against Germany's submarine activity.

Killing of Women and Children Called Cold-Blooded Murder in City Pulpits.

Vanderbilt's Pastor Wants Diplomatic Relations with the Kaiser Cut Off.

CALLS FOR ACTION AT ONCE

The Rev. Mr. Townsend Says Time Has Come to Demand a Return to Civilized Laws.

"A crime against civilization," the work of "a nation drunk with power," an "act not to be condoned," "one of the blackest acts ever perpetrated by human beings," "bloody murder pure and simple," "not piracy but organized murder," an act that "breaks down the neutrality of the United States," "unbelievably savage," and "abhorrent even to the standards of bloody war"—such were the comments of New York clergymen yesterday in their sermons dealing with the sinking of the Lusitania.

From scores of pulpits came protests coupled with appeals to the country at large to await calmly the deliberation and judgment of President Wilson and his advisers.

Bishop David H. Greer before starting out of town to preach pointed to a stack of telegrams on his table from individuals and organizations seeking his views in the present crisis.

"The situation is a grave one," he said. "We ought to be careful what we say. I would not trust myself at this time to say anything. That is my answer to all of these inquiries. I have my own views about war and peace, and they have not been changed by recent events, but this is a situation in which all are involved. It is time for calmness, I think, not for words."

At St. Patrick's Cathedral the Right Rev. M. J. Lavelle delivered the morning sermon in the absence of Cardinal Farley, who was dedicating the new Church of St. Raphael, in West Forty-first Street, between Tenth and Eleventh Avenues. Father Lavelle carefully avoided making any reference to the Lusitania, as did also Cardinal Farley and the others who spoke at the dedication services. Here is an epitome of the sermons dealing with the sinking of the Lusitania:

An Act Not to Be Condoned.

The Rev. Dr. Leighton Parks, rector of St. Bartholomew's Episcopal Church, which Alfred Gwynne Vanderbilt attended:

Germany has committed an act which could not be condoned and her attitude is such that there is little likelihood of her admitting the wrong in what she has done. Rather, she would seek to justify it. In that event, what shall we do? Go to war? No, let our brother, Germany, be unto us as a heathen, one who has cut himself off from the congregation of Israel, and a publican, this Germany which has loved education and has given to us a literature of its own, its music, its scientific achievements, its aspirations; this Germany which we had learned to admire and love.

Let us say to Germany, "You have placed yourself beyond the pale and we cannot for the time being have anything to do with you." Let us give to her accredited representatives in the Diplomatic and Consular service their passports. Let us recall our representatives from her Court and her cities. Yes, to this Germany, which has so deep a religious sentiment, let us say, for we are justified: "You have placed yourself outside of the bounds of Christianity. We are sorry, but you would not heed. You sought alone to be exempt from all the rules of humanity that civilization has dictated." Let us say that to Germany but let us remember that Germany is our brother for whom we pray.

A Colossal Sin Against God.

The Rev. Dr. John Henry Jowett, Pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, which Lindon Bates, Jr., and the members of the family of F. Warren Pearl, passengers on the Lusitania, attended, said:

It is a colossal sin against God and it is premeditated murder. It is a relapse into dark and savage barbarism. Within a week the unthinkable has happened. The incredible is commonplace, in the violation of ideals, in the riot of barbarism.

In this there is something worse than the death calamity in the papers. It is the decay of a national soul. This calamity is not a matter of restricted humanity, but an issue of common humanity. The sinking of the Lusitania was without an effort to save women and children.

I pray fervently that a great wave of pure, purposeful and active indignation may sweep around the globe, and that even Germany, the German people themselves, may rise in a stern and sacred protest against the infamy that has been perpetrated in her name.

A German Pastor's Views.

The Rev. Dr. A. B. Moldenke, pastor of St. Peter's Lutheran Church, in Lexington Avenue, one of the foremost German places of worship in this city:

If the United States were to go to war against Germany, either over the Lusitania incident or for other cause, and the cause were regarded by German-Americans as not just, even then Germans here would remain neutral. There is no fear that Germans resident here will be traitors to their adopted country. If the United States were to go to war against Germany with a just cause, German-Americans would go to war with their adopted country. Germans living here and enjoying the blessings of this country will not fight it. If they cannot fight with it, they will be neutral. There is no German anywhere, I am persuaded, who does not regret the sinking of this ship, and the loss of life it entailed.

The Germans who fired the torpedoes must have regretted the act. It was regarded as necessary by the course of Britain in trying to starve a whole nation of millions. No Germans in America but regret there were Americans on board, in spite of warnings. It has been said that the warnings given by Germany show the sinking of the ship to have been premeditated, and therefore worse. I say the warnings showed Germans to be solicitous that Americans be not endangered.

I do not hold the United States ought now to forbid the sending of war materials to Britain. I regret that this Government does allow such materials to go there. I go no farther. If Germany were able to transport munitions and land them in Germany the United States ought not to refuse her. I agree with Secretary Bryan that such order issued now would be to take sides with contending parties. The time to have forbidden materials to the nations at war was at the beginning of the war. What is now to be done? That we may safely leave to Washington. The Germans trust President Wilson. Whatever he does Germans will respect, even if they do not agree with him. Above all, we must pray God for guidance of all.

Barbarism the Issue.

The Rev. Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, pastor of the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church:

We have been staggered by a carefully premeditated act of inhuman[ity] which, although threatened, we did not believe a nation calling itself civilized capable of carrying out. A whole world was stunned by the loss of the Titanic, but the deliberate cruelty of man has outdone the destruction of an unthinking iceberg.

Inasmuch as our country is immediately involved in this frightful act, it becomes us to refrain from wild and hasty words and to face the situation with calm and sober judgment. Those who believe war is always an unchristian thing have wished that our country had been united in its protest from the beginning against this calamitous orgy of blood. But while our people are not yet sufficiently advanced to take this step, we cannot but unite in an indignant expostulation for an act that is abhorrent even to the standards of bloody war.

We have conscientiously striven to maintain as a nation strict neutrality. It is to be hoped we shall persevere in this attitude. But in the sinking of a passenger-laden vessel is an instance in which barbarism and civilization are clearly at issue. No nation can stand supinely aside and allow the hard-won moral gains of many generations to be ruthlessly destroyed. Not merely are the lives of our innocent fellow-citizens at stake, but the ethical standards of mankind are in danger of being dragged back into brutal savagery.

God grant that the horror of this tragedy may yet come home to the conscience of the German nation, and lead them to repudiate the course to which the Government has committed itself. But if this prayer be of no avail, God grant that we as a nation, with no spirit of vengeance and with unfailing kindness toward those whose actions we deem unworthy of them, may vigorously and faithfully assert and maintain for the world's sake the principles of humanity of which, for the moment, we are perforce the trusted champions.

A Crime Due to Militarism.

The Rev. John Haynes Holmes, pastor of the Church of the Messiah:

This is an hour for lamentation, but not for anger—an hour for grief, but not for madness. There is no more reason why we should go to war with Germany today than there was yesterday. On the contrary, there is infinitely more reason why, in the face of this monstrous horror, we should reaffirm our love of peace and our faith in reason and good will.

It is the war spirit which has done this thing. What shall it profit us to conjure up this spirit in our own country and thus extend the range of violence? It is militarism which has committed this crime. Why justify it by now applying ourselves to its decreees and methods! War settles nothing. It adds to horror, aggravates madness with madness, sanctifies the insane idea that the slaughter of a thousand men on shipboard can be met by the slaughter of unnumbered other thousands of men upon the fields of battle. Not thus is honor maintained and justice done. Now, if ever, is the time to show that America abhors the crime of war and sincerely believes in peace.

Enforce Civilization's Laws.

The Rev. S. De Lancey Townsend, rector of All Angels' Church:

This incident is but one of a series in which our flag has been attacked, our citizens murdered, and our Government openly flouted and insulted by those who enjoyed our hospitality, and who have for months sought our sympathy with their cause. By a policy which the people of this land have accepted, we have put ourselves where we seem absolutely helpless and contemptible in the eyes of those who today are boasting and rejoicing over this latest blot upon civilization.

We have been educated to believe that in this land there is the rule of the people, by the people, for the people. The constituted Government in Washington rules in our name, to do our will, and not to impose its will upon us. Therefore it is incumbent upon us, the people, as the sovereign power, to let the Government know what is our opinion and our will in this matter.

Doubtless this is a time for grave and careful, very careful, deliberation. It is also a time for very positive, emphatic, and powerful decision. It is time not only to see what is right and say what is right, but also to do what is right, to "take measures," as the President said in his note of Feb. 10.

I believe—and the unanimity, unparalleled unanimity, of the American press assures me that I am not alone—that the time has come when the people ought to demand that our Government should call for and secure the co-operation of all the nations yet neutral in establishing a concentrated power to secure and to enforce a return to the laws of civilization on the part of the nations at war. Such a concert of civilized powers could refuse commercial, financial, or diplomatic relations with any power which put itself beyond the pale of civilization, and that probably would be effective without firing a gun.

An Outrage Upon Humanity.

The Rev. Dr. Howard Duffield, pastor of the Old First Presbyterian Church, Fifth Avenue and Eleventh Street:

The torpedo which sank the Lusitania tore to shreds all further possibility of personal neutrality. This occurrence was not an affront to nationality, but an outrage upon humanity. Diplomats may adjust the international complications which it creates with nicely chosen phrases, and those who covet the reputation for superior sagacity may weigh the justifiableness of the procedure in the scales of an ingenious casuistry, but every soul the world round, who still retains a reverence for God and His will, and a decent respect for the opinions and conscience of mankind, will instinctively align itself in outspoken and uncompromising antagonism to the spirit which prompted and executed such wholesale murder.

It is called piracy. It is worse. Pirates do not act under orders. This foul deed was organized by Government authority and is acclaimed as a specimen illustration of the highest ideal of national efficiency; as the ripe fruit of a Kultur which it is the ordained mission of the German arm to impose upon the entire world. The men who planned it will thank their God for its achievement and will decorate its executioners with the sign of our Saviour who died on Calvary. Better a thousandfold to sleep beneath the Irish Sea than to live where such principles prevail and such men rule.

The Lusitania has not sunk. The Lusitania cannot sink. Like the ghost of murdered Banquo, "It will not down." And it may be that the dead women and little children who with the Atlantic for a winding sheet are awaiting the judgment of the great day, shall prove a more potent agency than sword and shell in hurling from their seats those who in the cold-blooded arrogancy of unbridled power sent them to their untimely doom.

What Will Washington Do?

The Rev. George W. Grinton, Secretary of the New York Methodist Conference and pastor of Fordham Methodist Church:

Again has the horror of war been brought to our doors. It is almost impossible to be calm under the terrible loss of life. Not only is the firing upon a merchant vessel a violation of international law, but in the face of the President's note to Germany it puts the matter squarely up to Washington. What will she do about it? The neutrality of the United States breaks down when American lives are sacrificed upon the altars of hate.

A Crisis in Civilization.

The Rev. George R. Montgomery, assistant pastor of the Madison Square Presbyterian Church:

This crisis in the world's civilization calls for superior guidance and counsel. It presents great difficulties, difficulties that are full of menace. Let us seek help from God's wisdom and take counsel with religious thought in meeting these problems and dangers confronting us, for all human efforts to cope with the situation have failed, and seem bankrupt so far as accomplishing anything for suffering humanity.

Murder Most Foul.

The Rev. Dr. David James Burrell, the Marble Collegiate Church, Fifth Avenue:

When the Titanic went down our hearts stood still, but that was an accident due to natural elements. This sinking of the Lusitania makes our nerves tremble, but it also arouses our better natures. It was a premeditated act, and all the worse because it was. What shall we say? Shall we [illegible] quoting Sherman, that war is hell? This sinking of the Cunarder is not war; it is murder! It is not piracy, for piracy has no Government behind it. This is organized murder; and no language is too strong so to call it. It is the Black Hole of Calcutta, the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, and the Piracy of the Barbary Coast rolled into one. It is on a level of poison in wells. I call it murder most foul, and if there were any words to give it a blacker name I would search them out and use them.

The situation is getting too hard for individuals. If I see a ruffian in the street beating a boy I may want to be neutral. I may say I know neither ruffian nor boy. But God help me, I am less than a man if I don't thrust in my hand. It is too much to ask me to keep out. So it is getting to be too much to ask America to keep out when Americans are drowned as part of a German war. Germans say they gave warning to Americans not to sail. What I'd like to know is, Who gave Germany or any other nation a right to make war zones on open seas and to warn people of other nations not to sail into them? Who owns the seas anyhow? When a representative of a foreign Government, staying among us, speaks thus to American people he is by all rules of common sense and everything else persona non grata, and needs to be sent home. How is it that these schemes of Germany to destroy our people are known to Germans here? There is no room in America for anybody but Americans.

We Must Not Stand Aside.

The Rev. Dr. Charles A. Eaton, of the Madison Avenue Baptist Church:

This nation stands at the moment at one of the great crisis in its history. It is not simply a matter of peace or war. It is, Are we willing to accept a place of spiritual leadership among the nations of the earth, and pay the price which acceptance involves? We are in the birth pangs of a new age. If America stands aside, anxious chiefly for her material prosperity, she will be left behind, and will miss her opportunity for moral and spiritual leadership. She must not stand aside.

A Time for Strict Control.

The Rev. Dr. William T. Manning, Pastor of Trinity Church:

Our hearts today are shocked and bowed down by the almost unbelievable occurrence of the past week. This is not a time for words. It is a time for us to hold ourselves in strict control. A time for us to pray that our Government, in whatever course it pursues, may proceed with wisdom, justice and unfaltering firmness.

Bloody Murder Pure and Simple.

The Rev. Malcolm James McLeod, pastor of the Collegiate Church of St. Nicholas:

There is no reason for a rupture. Let us see to it that there will be no rupture unless the other fellow starts it. There is no reason why we should go to war, but there is every reason why we should announce, and announce so loudly that the whole world will hear, what we think of some of the dastardly things that are being done in the name of necessity. To be silent on the question of the sinking of the Lusitania, to accept it with calm and agreeable composure, or to simply express a few diplomatic regrets is treachery to our just and holy God.

I was struck while reading the list how often it reads Mrs. So and So and infant. The idea that slaughtering babies is going to hasten the termination of this frightful world-tragedy is too preposterous to contemplate. It used to be that no army ever bombarded a fortified town without giving the women and children and civilians a chance to escape. We must sweep aside all racial prejudices. There is no other name for it; the whole thing is bloody murder pure and simple.

Warns Against False Fidelity.

Professor Francis B. Blodgett of the General Theological Seminary, at Trinity Church:

Look well into your hearts, and see if there is anything there bound to a false fidelity. Loyalty is the highest relation between persons. We possess this feeling because we belong to each other. We belong to our families, to our country, to our nation, but, above all else, we belong to the cause of righteousness and truth. In all places this day let there be a great searching of hearts, and let us not give way to hasty anger, but be conscious of a greater power than our national one.

Must Arraign Offending Nations.

The Rev. Dr. Edwin D. Bailey, pastor of the Prospect Heights Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn:

The sinking of the Lusitania by what appears to be deliberate premeditation affords an opportunity and creates a necessity to register a protest and demand redress, with guarantees against a repetition, not only for this shocking offense, but for the other scarcely less shocking atrocities of this war.

Shall we back our protests and demands with the force and power of our army and navy? Shall we risk the possibilities of war? We need not answer these questions now. It is our duty to set ourselves right on the great moral issues involved, without considering the consequences. We must set ourselves to the task of arraigning offending nations at the bar of justice. Our war must be waged in the realm of reason, in the spiritual realm, and we must assume that in that realm we shall conquer. If our demands are flouted, if our power is defied, if the violation of the rights of humanity continues, if justice is denied and madness is regnant, if we have fallen upon a time when only brute force avails, then and then only will our duty to God and humanity require an appeal to arms.

Would Stop German Propaganda.

The Rev. Dr. S. Edward Young, pastor of the Bedford Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn:

The moment has come for outspoken protest against Germany's conduct of the war by the multitude of preachers, publicists, and laymen who, complying with President Wilson's request for neutrality, have kept silence for over nine months while Ambassador von Bernstorff, Dr. Dernburg, and a host of other German advocates violated the President's expressed wish by carrying on a campaign against neutrality. We now say to our sincerely respected German friends and German-American fellow-citizens, "You have enjoyed here a thousand times more liberty of speech than either we or yourselves would be permitted in Germany. You have won over nobody. The conscience of the American nation is against your Prussian militarism and its incarnation of Nietzsche's dictum, 'Let every one who is strong seek to make himself dominant at the expense of the weak.'"

Most of us thought our Government should have protested when Germany trampled Belgium, when she scattered deadly mines to drift upon the sea anywhere and everywhere, when she despoiled Louvain, when she sank the Frye and the Gulflight. Now that Germany has defied this Government's official notification, and has carried piracy to the utmost limit in sinking the Lusitania, we are going to lift up our voices in denunciation and are ready to go further to stop these outrages against what we and practically everybody outside of Germany, Austria, and Turkey deems barbaric.

America can not be silent or inactive after this. We are in an awful and dangerous crisis. One spark could set the land aflame. The wisest friends of Germany here will take care to uphold the hands of President Wilson and to cease calling for the impeachment of the Secretary of State for not forbidding Americans to sail on the Lusitania. Universal prayer is surely being offered for our calm, brave, God-fearing President, whose task is heavier than any man's since Lincoln.

May Lead to an Appeal for Peace.

The Rev. Dr. Christian F. Reisner, pastor of Grace Methodist Episcopal Church:

Rather than talk of sending a fleet and of writing an ultimatum, let us go [illegible] our knees that we may find out God's way [illegible] the war. Many folk [illegible] would really delight in it if we could be dragged into the fray. We need to pray earnestly lest we lose our heads and thus lose our Christian chance to help reconstruct the world. The indescribably horrible sinking of the Lusitania may awaken Americans anew to the terrors of war. In our dullness to the anguish across the way we have almost forgotten to pray for peace. We are slowly beginning again to think that we are independent of all things and peoples. The horrors of the loss of the Lusitania may so awaken the world that there may be some kind of a resistless appeal aroused that will bring peace.

"Whom the Gods Destroy."

The Rev. Karl Reiland, rector of St. George's Episcopal Church:

Those whom the gods destroy they first make mad. I believe that no power, no nation, can last which has not God's hand in the making of it, no matter how great or strong it may for the time appear. Remember, God's will will prevail.

No Peace Without Honor.

The Rev. Claudius M. Roome, Chaplain of the Seventh Regiment of the National Guard, at a memorial service held at St. Thomas's Church yesterday afternoon:

The police force is maintained to hold the lawless in check and to maintain peace. In the same sense, while war is the last resort after all others have failed, no man of ous is willing to tolerate a peace with all nations unless that peace be one guarded with honor.

Time alone will tell what course is to be adopted by these United States ours to safeguard our own peculiar destinies, but in any event we cannot tolerate the aggression of any one nation which would impose its own ideals and destinies upon an alien race. Ours is a high destiny which will show itself at its best and noblest on that day when we shall be asked to arbitrate in Europe for the cause of peace.

While neutrality does not forbid individual sympathies, as a nation the United States ought to remain neutral. The time has long gone by when this country could rely upon its isolated position to keep it out of European wars. As one of the great powers of the world we have as much interest in the present war as any of the belligerents, but only when those interests are provoked or threatened should we take sides, and then fight with all the determination we can muster.

A Brutal and Inhuman Act.

The Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, pastor of the Central Congregational Church of Brooklyn, speaking yesterday afternoon at the West Side Y. M. C. A., Eighth Avenue and Fifty-seventh Street, on "Disarmament—Should Our Nation Lead the Way," was asked afterward what he thought of the destruction of the Lusitania, and responded without hesitation:

"I think it was a brutal and inhuman act."

One of the audience asked:

"Don't you think France or England would have done the same thing under the circumstances?"

"I do not want to make comparisons," said Dr. Cadman, "but I may say that I think it was an inhuman act and an everlasting disgrace to the men who authorized it."

The address itself hardly mentioned the subject of disarmament by name, but dealt constantly with the necessity of being ready to defend threatened ideals at any cost. The word "German" was not mentioned in the entire talk, but the implication of the speaker was often unmistakable and he was constantly interrupted by prolonged applause.

"The time has come," Mr. Cadman went on, "and has been coming for some time past, when we don't want to hear anything in this country from men who are not loyal to Americanism and the spirit of American institutions. It is creditable to the American people that they have remained calm through the recent painful occurrence, but at the same time, we wish to indicate that there are certain ideals which we intend to maintain.

"There are men in the world today who are violently opposed to democracy, who claim that their crowns came from God. There are men who maintain that justice is not the esence of international relations, but power; the power of the strong to live expensively at the cost of the weak. And this is not the argument of a warrior, but has been put forward by doctors and poets and professors and learned men to give a godly hue to things that have hitherto been considered outside the pale of common decency."

Dr. Cadman said that he hoped ultimately for the establishment of an international federation with a court of supreme power, armed to enforce his decrees; but in answer to a question he asserted that it was no time now to talk of disarmament.

"If we disarmed now," he said, "we would be like a big, fat, juicy oyster without a shell."

BAD DAY FOR CURB ORATORS.

Germans at Bulletin Boards Argue Against a Tide of Derision.

The little band of German "educators" who took up their stand in front of the Times bulletin board in Times Square yesterday and faced the task of justifying the sinking of the Lusitania, soon realized that they were confronting the most difficult problem of the war. The debate went on from early morning until late at night, but reached its full fury between 3 and 5 o'clock in the afternoon. During that period the crowd about the bulletin board varied in size from 500 to 1,000, and the excited voices could be heard a block away.

A big, broad-shouldered German, who by his very size commanded respect and attracted attention, was leading the debate at 4:30 o'clock. He told his hearers that the Lusitania was carrying ammunition and supplies; that Americans had been warned that she would be attacked, and were told not to go on her. Then in a loud voice he shouted:

"And the boat was armed, ready to destroy a German ship if one came in sight. She was nothing more than a warship. Therefore we had the right to sink her."

For the moment no one had a ready answer, and the speaker waited in silence. A man in the crowd who happened to glance at the bulletin board at that point read the latest bulletin which was being printed. It announced that Dudley Field Malone, Collector of the Port, had announced that he inspected the Lusitania before she sailed, and that she was not armed and carried no guns.

"Can you read that?" shouted the man. "Is Malone a liar? What have you got to say now?"

"How do you know that is true?" answered the German.

But the crowd deserted him for another speaker, and all of his work was lost.

In another corner a young man in a shrill voice shouted that the English were to blame for the sinking of the Lusitania.

"Germany had a right to sink her," he cried. "When the truth is known it will be shown that England invited this thing. Why didn't she send ships to convoy the Lusitania to port? Because she invited the sinking of the Lusitania and hoped that it would turn the United States against Germany."

"If you haven't got anything better than that, why, quit," retorted one of his audience, and the young man sought cover.

But despite the rebuffs the German accelerators of opinion kept at their task manfully.

When it was possible the conversation was switched from the sinking of the Lusitania, but, once cornered, they did their best to justify the act. Frequently their talks were interrupted with loud shouts of derision. One man shouted:

"You can say what you want. I'm almost ashamed of my own flag when I think that something has not been done to demand an explanation of this outrage. It was murder, pure and simple."

A good deal of excitement was stirred up early in the day when a dozen sailors from one of the battleships at anchor in the North River appeared in front of the bulletin board and jeered the German speakers. The sailors were ready for trouble, and a row was averted by the narrowest of margins. Several Germans in the crowd were jostled, and the speakers were silenced for a time. Then the sailors, tired of the debate, drifted away, and the bedlam started again.

CALL ON PRESIDENT FOR PROMPT ACTION

Letters to The Times Indorse Mr. Wickersham's Plea for a Definite Step.

DR. ABBOTT TELEGRAPHS

He Would Disown All Fellowship with Germany — "Indecision a Crime"—Propaganda Criticized.

By Telegraph to the Editor of The New York Times.

Cornwall-on-Hudson, May 9, 1915.

You have rendered an important public service by your publication of Mr. Wickershams letter and your editorial in this mornings issue. These offer to the American people a leadership for which we have looked to the President in vain.

I remember the Winter of 1860-61, when President Buchanan had the authority, but not the capacity to command, and while he stood helpless at the helm the country drifted toward civil war. When Sumter was fired on, Lincoln acted. He did not wait to deliberate beforehand.

In such a crisis, courage is a duty and timidity a crime; dread of war creates peril of war, and no decision is so bad as indecision. You have given us a definite policy to discuss. I do not here discuss it, but I thank you for making it clear that, not by words only, but by some decisive action, America should disown all fellowship with a power which perpetrates massacre of unarmed citizens on the high seas and calls it war.

LYMAN ABBOTT.

Commends Wickersham's Advice.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I understand that President Wilson, before taking action in the present perplexing situation brought about by the sinking of the Lusitania, wants to sense the opinion of the people at large.

Quite right. I hope he has read Mr. Wickersham's letter in your today's issue. I think it expresses the opinion of the majority and offers a good suggestion as to the proper course to pursue. Especially the suggestion of inviting all neutral nations to join us in council appeals to me. T. W.

No Time for Smooth Messages.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

This last crowning exploit marks the Germans as barbarian outlaws. The official notice issued by the German Embassy shows that the destruction of the Lusitania was a deliberately planned murder—perhaps the most appalling crime against the laws of civilization, of humanity, and of God that the world has known.

Moreover, it is to be noted, this murder for which the German Government is directly responsible is approved, or at least cooly defended, by those who speak for the German people.

Is it possible that the United States can with decent self-respect continue to maintain polite diplomatic intercourse with these barbarians? Ought we not immediately to sever all diplomatic relations, recalling our Ambassador and stating to the world that the Germans by their outrageous and inhuman acts have placed themselves outside of the pale of civilization?

The Administration seems to be taking special pride in the fact that it is giving "very calm" consideration to the situation. There are times when calmness is nothing to boast of, and it seems to me this is such a time. The facts are clear cut, and moreover they are cumulative, following logically many previous occurrences.

It is no time to exchange smooth messages with friends whose hands are steeped in the blood of innocent victims. IRVING PUTNAM.

The Alamo Slaughter Recalled.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The letter of Mr. George W. Wickersham, printed in this mornings Times, truly represents the feelings of the majority of the voters of this country, notwithstanding the noise made (largely for value received) by an active foreign minority.

I predict that, as the cowardly murder of 102 Americans by 6,000 Mexicans at the Alamo brought on the Mexican War, so the cowardly murder of 120 Americans by a German submarine will bring an end to the poor, cringing attitude we have hitherto maintained toward the bully of Europe. It means that the American people will now, at last, line up beside the civilized powers that are bravely fighting the battle of civilization against the most brazen ruffianism that the world has seen for a century.

Every reason dictates this course. If we wish to retain the respect of the world and to go down into history as a nation worthy of respect, we must act as a conscientious and brave man would act in daily life. The notion (made in Germany) that there is one morality for a man and another for a nation is simply not true, and there is no American citizen worthy of the name but knows it is not true. For a nation to be faithless to treaty obligations, wantonly aggressive to weaker nations, brutally cruel, and unworthy of all trust is not wise policy from any point of view, and Germany is only now learning this truth. Similarl, for a man or a nation to act the part of a coward, to refuse to stand up for the right, because such a course involves danger, to see friends unjustly attacked and cruelly treated and not raise a hand in their defense, to sneak out the back way when every call of honor and duty appeals to one to fight—and to the death if need be—this is the course of the poltroon. This is the course of the coward, and all men justly despise and condemn it.

We have got to fight Germany and now—not next year, not when by some chance she may have worn down those brave nations which are now upholding civilization and may have realized her mad dream of world conquest, but now. If she wins in Europe, is there any poor, deluded, peace-at-any-price advocate who imagines that one month would pass before her fleets would be bombarding New York? We can avoid this conflict, we can swallow this unparalleled wrong in the wanton murder of our innocent fellow citizens, offered us with all the insult a Prussian can offer, only by crawling, and we will not crawl.

The majority of the people of this country come of a proud race. Until very recent years a question [illegible] sign insult to the American flag was resented promptly. Now, it seems, we must humbly swallow such insults. We must not rock the boat. Senator Stone says so. W. S. G.

End the Propaganda.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

We Americans want nothing to do with Germany, she is outlawed—send her Ambassador to that hothouse of iniquity, his home. We Americans do not wish any German-Americans among us, (we want Americans,) let them leave now in this time of world war; we want no propaganda of the German cause. Our country wishes to remain at peace, but not to continue friendly relationship with a Government that encourages piracy and murder.

THOMAS JEWETT HALLOWELL.

Would Excommunicate Germany.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

It was not an act of momentary and forgivable passion, the sinking of the Lusitania, with its load of human freight. The men who sent the frightful missile to its mark had lain in wait on orders. News of the event was celebrated in Germany with flags and shouts. Formal regrets at the loss of innocent lives were indeed forthcoming, but they were plainly tinged with "we-told-you-so malice. Americans are forced to the conclusion that the dreadful act was duely deliberafel by German leaders, and that the mass of German people, both here and abroad, are disposed to stand behind these leaders in defense of as vile a deed as even blackened the page of history.

What can we do to uphold our honor and the cause of civilization? In arms we are almost as weak as China, and to attempt blood reprisal would be to sink to a low plane and to sacrifice what little remains for the upbuilding of the worlds peace. But in America moral force has gained through the loss of force at arms. Joining hands with Norway, Sweden, and Holland, who, like us, have paid a sad toll to the Kaisers madness, we can together excommunicate Germany from the society of nations. Already ringed by fire and iron, the lost people can still be made to feel the weight of the worlds condemnation. Then in physical and spiritual isolation let them hug a guilty conscience for comfort till in awful realization they hush the blasphemy upon their lips and wipe the murder from their hands.

We have their ships in our harbors. These are better hostages than princes of the blood. Let us withdraw our citizens, our Consuls, and our Ministers from this land beyond the pale and put the brand of the renegade upon this people who scorn the laws of God and man.

Where Senator Stone Stands.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I wish to thank you for your splendid leading editorial this morning on "The Law of the Lusitania Case." The President wishes to know how the country feels. Let him make no mistake. Senator Stone is, of course, active for his German constituents. He displayed the same activity in espousing the Ship Purchase bill, but has so far failed to explain to the public his interest in having the ship bill pass. W. S. G.

From an Angry Citizen.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Is Senator Stone a member of the German Government or an American? It is not a question of the British flag, but whether we are going to make good our warning to Germany. Are we always going to do in the future as in the past, clinch our fists, shout and swagger and make faces without the power or pluck of a new-born babe to make ourselves respected? If we are going to act as a nation we should be prepared to back our word by force. Are we at this late date going to accept Germany's orders by placing an embargo on arms and back down? Have we only the courage of the bully and no self-respect? D. B.

PASTORS URGE RESTRAINT.

Pleas for Divine Guidance Voiced in Washington Pulpits.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, May 9.—In practically all of the churches in this city reference was made today to the destruction of the Lusitania, either in prayers or sermons. Special prayers were offered in some pulpits for the mothers of those who went down on the doomed liner, today being observed as mothers' day. Some pastors prayed for the President of the United States and asked that this country be not plunged into war by any incident in connection with the European conflict.

The Rev. James T. Marshall, pastor of West Street Presbyterian Church, made special reference to the grave importance attached to the most recent war development, and aked in his prayer at the morning service that peace might continue for the United States.

The Rev. J. J. Muir, pastor of Temple Baptist Church, Tenth and N Streets, Northwest, prayed for divine consolation for the mothers of the victims of the Lusitania.

The Rev. Rolland Cotton Smith, rector of St. John's Episcopal Church, Sixteenth Street and Lafayette Square, said it was time for the utmost quiet and calm and trust in those in charge of the affairs of the nation.

The Rev. Father Smith, at St. Patrick's Church, preached on the "Mother of God," and at te end of his strmon made a plea for peace and the safe guidance of the nation in the present crisis.

The Rev. Dr. Forrest J. Prettyman, Chaplain of the Senate and pastor of the Mount Pleasant M. E. Church South, referred to the grave situation of affairs, and offered a prayer for peace, as did also the Rev. Dr. W. R. Wedderspoon at Foundry Methodist Church.

The Rev. Dr. Wallace Radcliffe, at the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, made an impassioned plea for divine guidance in dealing with the problems that confront the nation.

The Rev. U. G. B. Pierce counseled members of his congregation, that it was a time for all Americans to exercise cool judgment and restraint, and to display their patriotism in loyalty to the dispassionate judgment of those in charge of affairs of State.

APPEALS TO WILSON TO BAR BERNSTORFF

Victor E. Mitchell, K. C., of Montreal Urges Passports Be Given Ambassador.

THINKS HIM IMPERTINENT

Letter Calls Publication of Warning by Embassy an Insult to the United States.

Special to The New York Times.

MONTREAL, Que., May 9.—The following letter was telegraphed to President Wilson by Victor E. Mitchell, K. C., a well-known lawyer of this city, tonight:

[The letter was received in The New York Times office over the same wire and at the same time it was going into the White House.]

To His Excellency Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

Sir—Appalled by the latest crime against humanity committed in the name of German Kultur, I am moved to address the following remarks to you. As you know the war zone declared by Germany is not a blockade of the British coasts, and there is no authority in international law for the establishment of a war zone of the character declared by Germany; but even if the German Navy were able to maintain an effective blockade, the penalty of disregarding it is capture of the offending ship for condemnation by a prize court, and not sinking, unless the ship attempts to evade capture by flight and then only in case of necesity.

Under no circumstances and under no law, human or divine, can the sinking even of enemy merchant ships, without notice and without giving the passengers and crew an opportunity to escape, be justified. Such action is nothing more or less than cold-blooded murder.

Germany claims, however, that as this war was forced upon her, first by Russia and then by Great Britain, and she is now fighting for her very existence, all measures though they offend against the whole decalogue and all sentiments of humanity and civilization are justifiable, and that neutral powers must stand aside, no matter how their own rights are affected, and tamely permit her without interference to wreak her will upon the nations which have dared to tand up against German Kultur and German might in defense of our common civilization.

By Order of the Kaiser.

Acting on the barbarous view that "necessity knows no law" the German Government claims that the sinking of merchant and passenger ship is a military duty imposed upon the officers and men of their submarines by superior authority, and consequently when any of these officers and men are captured they are entitled to all the honors of war. The responsibility for the sinking of the Lusitania is therefore fixed. It was done by order of the Kaiser and his military advisers, for which the German Government must assume responsibility.

The representative of this Government, which ordered the Lusitania to be sank, well knowing that there were many American citizens on board, is living in security in Washington. The fact that "by order of the Imperial German Embassy" an advertisement was inserted in American newspapers, warning Americans not to sail on British ships, is no palliation of the crime of committed by order of the German Government. American citizens had, under all recognized rules of international law, the right to sail on the Lusitania free from any interference by Germany, and the only right the Germans had in regard to the Lusitania was the right of capture, or if they were unable to take her to a German port, the right to sink her, but only after taking off the passengers and crew.

The publication of the warning by order of "The Imperial German Embassy" was an insult to the United States. It was an attempt to dictate to the citizens of a free and sovereign state what they should do and what they should not do, with the penalty of death for disobedience. Thus runs the fist of the German Emperor in the United States. The German Government knew that this insulting order, or warning, would be and had been disregarded by the American people, but that did not deter the Kaiser and his Government from imposing the threatened penalty, and now many of your citizens have paid with their lives for their temerity in not believing, at the order of the Imperial German Embassy, that his most Christian Majesty the Kaiser and the German Government were capable of carrying a threat to murder into effect against the peaceful citizens of a friendly and neutral state.

How are you going to avenge this foul and brutal murder of your own citizens? Are you still going to treat with the representative of the Government which ordered and planned in advance the commission of this crime on terms of amity, the Ambassador who has on several occasions impertinently told the Government and the people of the United States what their duty is from the German standpoint, and who is now trying to show what happens to Governments and people who will not do as they are told by "order of the Imperial German Embassy"?

Germany as the Common Enemy.

Shades of Washington and Grant, is it not time for some one to act in defense of the rights and liberties of the American people so dearly bought by the blood of their heroic ancestors? Is the Government of the United States impotent to protect the lives of its citizens outside of its own boundaries? So far you have quite properly observed a strict neutrality, although many of your own citizens would have welcomed a protest on behalf of Belgium, but now after this outrage, should not the United States be found fighting the common enemy and murderers of women and children, side by side with the Allies?

Whatever may have been the original cause of the war, there can be no doubt that Great Britain and her allies, at a tremendous sacrifice of blood and treasure, are now not only fighting for their existence as independent nations, but for the maintenance of those principles upon which our common civilization is based and which all free people hold more dear than life itself. If the Allies win the benefit will not be for them alone, but for all nations whose Governments are based, however imperfectly, on the eternal principles of individual liberty and of government of the people, by the people, for the people, and not only those nations will benefit, but all other nations who are struggling to wrest those priceless liberties from their rulers. Those principles and those liberties are now in danger—are now, in fact, being ridden over roughshod by autocratic Germany with her Kultur and her doctrine that "might is right."

Can you or any man contemplate what would happen to the United States and the rest of the world if Germany were triumphant, and Great Britain, the mother of parliamentary and responsible government; France, with her art; Belgium, who preferred death to dishonor, and Serbia, whose gallant fight has won her undying fame, were beaten and made vassal States of Germany? I omit bighearted and religious Russia, for, while she may be beaten and humiliated, even Germany with all her mighty strength cannot grind her to dust as she could in the event of victory grind Britain, France, Belgium, and Serbia. For nearly nine months Germany and Austria have fought and held the Allies in check with undiminished vigor, and the ultimate result of the war as now waged no man can foresee.

Germany has abandoned all rule of international law, repudiated all conventions with neutral as well as enemy States, and has thrown every consideration of humanity to the winds, and now she wages war on neutrals and murders defenseless men, women, and children belonging to a friendly State. What are the neutral powers going to do about it? What is the United, States, the greatest of all neutral States, and whose citizens have been dastardly murdered, going to do about it?

Says Facts Are Known.

I read in the newspaper that you, Sir, have requested, through the United States Ambassador in Berlin, an explanation of the sinking of the Lusitania from the German Government, and that, after you are in possession of the facts, you will decide what is to be done to protect the national honour, but are not the facts known? Is the fact disputed that American citizens are now lying cold and still at the bottom of the sea, sent to their death unprepared and without a moment's warning by order of the German Government, and do not their poor, dumb mouths cry aloud for retribution?

Ah, Sir, the facts! Are not they, and other equally damnable facts, written in black and bloody letters across the sky of civilization, darkening the sunlight of liberty, and can the great land of liberty stand indifferently by and leave to the Allies the punishment for this outrage on your own citizens?

What reparation can Germany make that will justify the United States in continuing to treat her as a friendly power, until she has punished the murderers of her own citizens? Can you with honor accept a money indemnity from the Government that ordered the murder? Will an apology meet the case? Will a promise to refrain in future from committing like barbarities be acceptable from a power that regards even solemn treaties as scraps of paper? And would such promise, if given, wipe out the studied affront to your national dignity and sovereign power?

Sir, is there not only one answer to make which is consistent with a national honor, and that is to hand the representative of the outlawed Government of Germany, by whose orders your citizens were murdered, his passports?

Frankly, my appeal to you is to throw off the shackles of a forced and unreal neutrality and to call upon your people, who only await your word to take their stand with those who fight for freedom and for right against barbarism, enslavement and might. Bid them to gird up their loins for the fray, to acquit themselves like men and let God defend the right. I have the honor to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

VICTOR E. MITCHELL, K. C.

UPHELD IN GERMAN PULPITS.

Due Warning Plea in Justification by Cleveland Clergymen.

Special to The New York Times.

CLEVELAND, Ohio, May 9.—Charging Germany with guilt of "Wholesale murder and piracy such as the world never before knew," the Rev. Ferdinand Q. Blanchard, pastor of the Euclid Avenue Congregational Church, demanded that the United States put an end to this "crime against civilization."

At the same time many pastors of churches in which German is the pulpit tongue were voicing defense of the sinking of the Lusitania.

"The hour for tolerant neutrality has passed," declared the Rev. Mr. Blanchard. "I will not trust myself to speak carelessly, but I must give expression to what I deeply feel. In every way which is possible America ought to speak at this time."

That the Lusitania's passengers had many warnings was the German ministers' plea in discussing the sinking of the Cunarder.

"The death of passengers of the Lusitania is to be deplored," declared the Rev. J. F. Frederick Keller, pastor of Evangelical Lutheran Christ Church. "However, I hold Germany is absolutely justified in sending to the bottom a boat which carried nearly a half million dollars' worth of munitions of war.

"These passengers were warned before they sailed. Why should the submarine have given them a second warning? War is war, and the passengers must take their chances just as do those men who go to the front to fight in Flanders."

It is one thing to hire a contractor solely on a legal basis, without regard to his record, or his ability to perform his contract promises.

But to hire a contractor whose name is a synonym throughout the building industry for efficiency and results, that is another thing entirely—and in the minds of the best informed Owners in this country, it is the only thing.

DERNBURG WARNS AMERICANS AGAIN

Says They Cannot Be Classed as Neutrals When Traveling on Enemy Ships.

DEFENDS LUSITANIA ATTACK

Blames England for Submarine Warfare—Admits Our Friendship Has Been Strained.

Dr. Bernhard Dernburg, former Colonial Secretary of the German Empire, said last night at the Ritz-Carleton that there could be no abandonment by Germany of her relentless submarine warfare not only against enemy ships but against contraband cargo ships without regard to nationality or neutrality.

"To do less would not be Germany's plain duty under the circumstances and conditions forced upon her by her enemies in violation of both international law and hTe Hague agreements," said he.

Intimating that Americans could not be considered neutrals if they persisted, in the face of repeated warnings, in traveling on enemy ships within the war zone, Dr. Dernburg continued:

"Now, this is the main point: How can Americans, claiming to be neutral, lose sight of this danger? Any American traveler on an American boat is safe anywhere on the high seas so far as Germany is concerned. Equally safe will be the American travel on an American contraband cargo boat or neutral vessel, so far as it is within human possibility for Germany to insure safety. The American flag will protect them when it flies from an American ship."

Dr. Dernburg did not explain how Americans would be saved from a contraband ship when attacked without warning by a submarine.

Referring to the use of the American flag by the Lusitania recently, he said:

"There was the only one danger. Happily that was stopped by the protest of President Wilson. To insure absolute protection to Americans and other neutral travelers the condition should be enforced that none of these passenger ships should carry contraband of war. This is easy to accomplish. It may clearly be made known to the public by the manifest filed at the Custom House when the ship clears."

Justifies Lusitania Attack.

In reply to questions Dr. Dernburg repeated his opinion that Germany was justified in sinking the Lusitania.

"I say we are not to blame. It is a catastrophe of war, due to the conditions forced upon Germany. I regret the loss of American lives, as do all Germans. It always has been and is the desire of Germany to retain the friendship of this country; every effort has been made at all times to do nothing that could in any way break or interrupt the continuation of friendly feeling. This misfortune that has cost the lives of Americans has probably had an effect on that friendship, but Americans should think of the situation that confronts Germany.

"I understand there were some 5,000 cases or more of war materials on that ship. The Cunard Line is responsible for it because of its invitation to the public to risk their lives in the face of the warning given to the public. The British Admiralty is equally, if not more, responsible for permitting innocent American travelers to be used as shields on a ship that was nothing more or less than an auxiliary cruiser and contraband carrier under its jurisdiction since the war began."

"Have you any evidence that the Lusitania carried a weapon of defense of any kind?" he was asked.

"Only so far as I am informed. I know that the sister ship of the Lusitania, the Caronia, acted as an armed auxiliary cruiser off this port. The Lusitania stood in the same relation to the British Admiralty, with the exception that she was engaged in carrying contraband instead of cruising work.

"If Germany is to permit such ships to be used in carrying munitions of war for the Allies it means that Germany would be allowing the enemy to get the materials with which it might pound their way through the German lines and cause far more suffering thereby and to many more women, children, and other non-combatants of Germany than those affected by the stopping of this traffic in contraband."

Dr. Dernburg, citing what he termed England's "starvation" mode of warfare against Germany and her allies, and the embargo laid against traffic with neutral nations, continued:

"I say, would it not be the duty of Germany to prevent this condition?"

In defense of the submarine he said:

Blames England for Submarine.

"The submarine is a recognized instrument of war. Every nation has them. England is building them, as well as having them built here, and shipping the parts to Canada to be put together. And England intends to use them when she has the opportunity against German ships.

"It is England that has created the new form of modern warfare by the use of the submarine, which ignores international law and the Hague agreements. England has done this by establishing the longrange blockade. It has always been a recognized rule of war to seize a contraband ship as well as destroy the enemy ships. It has been the custom heretofore to take off passengers and crews and tow a ship into port. But a submarine, say 150 feet long, cannot do this. It has no accommodations for either passengers or crew. The submarine is a frail craft and may easily be rammed, and a speedy ship is capable of running away from it.

"Instead of giving a specific notice of capture or seizure through the commander of the submarine Germany gave specific notice to everybody before the submarine attack on the Lusitania. That was the only thing that could be done."

Asserting that Germany had been willing to discontinue submarine warfare on merchant and passenger ships had England consented to the proposal made through President Wilson for the admission of foodstuffs and non-contraband to Germany, Dr. Dernburg said:

"If that had been conceded, no such thing could have happened as the attack upon the Lusitania. We are using the submarines for self-protection, just as you have them in the American Navy, examples of which you may see today by going to the North River to view the underwater fleet anchored there with other war vessels."

Talk to Little Girls Costs $10.

Moris Mandel, 55 years old, of St. Nicholas and 153d Street, was fined $10 by Magistrate Sims in the Night Court last night on a charge of disorderly conduct, preferred by Thomas J. Corrigan, an Inspector in the Treasury Department, who said that he watched Mandel because of a supposed resemblance between him and a man wanted in the "ripper" case, and that he saw him talking to two little girls and reaching out his hands to others. Detectives McAuliffe and Hastings of the Second Branch made the arrest and satisfied themselves that Mandel was not the man Corigan suspected him to be.

Wife Has Photographer Arrested.

Herbert M. Dean, a moving picture photographer, who says he followed many of the campaigns of General Villa with his camera, was arrested last night at a boarding house at 209 West Ninety-seventh Street by Detective Love of the Fourth Branch and locked up in Police Headquarters on the charge of failure to support his wife, Tillie A. Dean, and their fourteen-year-old daughter. Dean protested that he had had no employment since last October.

GERMANY TAKING 'MOVIES' OF THE WAR

Has Organized a "Film Corps," Which Will Chronicle Activities of the Armies on the Screen.

OPERATORS ON ALL FRONTS

Their Task Almost as Hazardous as That of the Soldiers Who Are Fighting in the Trenches.

The German General Staff has organized what is styled the "Film Corps" of the German Army, the members of which are charged with the taking of moving pictures of the German activities both behind and at the firing lines, a service that the German Information Service states is as hazardous almost as that of the soldier who exposes himself in front of the trenches. These moving-picture men have been assigned to the various German commands. The pictures are taken under the supervision of officers detailed for the purupose and are afterward developed in the German War Office in Berlin.

"Some of the 'movies,'" the German Information Service story of the Film Corps reads, "are allowed to be shown in the picture theatres; others are incorporated in the 'film archives,' which already contain over 2,000 films for future use.

"The moving-picture operator of a film manufacturing concern who left the western front and came to Berlin for a few days' holiday has given a graphic account of his work. The film correspondent traversed the theatre of war in his fast automobile, relying on his chauffeur and good fortune. His permanent residence was at headquarters, where he was always at the disposal of the military authorities.

"A typical day's work he thus describes: At 6 A. M., while still asleep, his host called him, and he was ordered to take pictures of the battlefield and the positions at D. Half an hour later he was sitting in his automobile driving along the highroad at a furious speed.

"Carrying two cameras, one in front and another as a reserve on his back, he walked two or three miles along the road under the French shrapnel fire. At last the long tramp along the road was over, and now his orders were to walk right across the battlefield where the conflict was raging a few days ago and which still bears visible marks of the fight. He had to pass empty cellars, collapsed houses, aqueducts, and subterranean passages, creeping on his hands and knees or slowly advancing with down bent body until he touched a tent wall.

"He opened the tent and found himself in one of the trenches. There was an uncanny stillness around him. Here the soldiers were confronting the enemy at a distance of only a few meters. They did not speak, but only whispered, so as not to betray their presence.

"An easier job is offered to the photographer at the artillery positions, showing considerable motion. But the luckiest chance is when hostile air craft approaches and the cannons, belching forth their shrapnel in quick succession, force an aviator to descend. But the artist should not venture forth too far in order to take the aviator's picture in the air. The flash of the lens once betrayed him, because suddenly a shower of aviators' arrows came whizzing down around him.

"The war has two zones. In the front zone destruction rages, and in the back constructive work is done. That reconstruction in the rear is specially meritorious and an unsurpassed accomplishment of the German military authorities. It is one of the most important tasks of the film reporter to catch that peaceful phase of the war in its main features and its continuous development.

"He records the progress in the reconstruction of bridges which the enemy has blown up and which are often improved. He registers the repairs done by the engineers of great electricity works. He watches landwehr men as they plow French and Belgian fields and with a white cloth tied around their field gray uniforms scatter the seed far and wide in the fruitful soil."

SHOT AT LIFE-SAVING CRAFT?

Reports at Cork That the Submarine Attacked Them.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CORK, May 9, (Dispatch to The London Daily Chronicle.)—A boat reports that while off Oyster Haven three distinct shots were heard.

This story is confirmed by a number of survivors, who assert that the submarine fired three times on life-saving vessels. My informants are positive these were shots from light guns.

CROWDS HOSTILE TO GIOLITTI.

Former Premier in Rome to Confer on International Situation.

The visit of Former Premier Giolitti to Rome, it is believed here, will hasten a decision as to Italy's attitude with regard to Austria. Signore Giolitti today had a long interview with Signor Carcano, the Minister of the Treasury, who also served in Giolitti's Cabinet, and discussed with him at length the international situation.

While in Rome Signor Giolitti also will have interviews with King Victor Emmanuel, Premier Salandra, Baron Sonnino, and Prince von Buelow, the German Ambassador to Italy.

It is reported that Austria, urged by Germany, is ready to make other concessions to Italy, but that these do not include the cession of Trieste.

A DANCE AT ASHEVILLE.

Insurance Officials Among the Guests at Grove Park Inn.

Special to The New York Times.

ASHEVILLE, N. C., May 9.—Officers of the New York Life Insurance Company were among the guests at the Grove Park Inn dance last evening, remaining at the inn after the close of the sectional meeting of agency Directors. President Darwin P. Kingsley and Vice President John C. McCall were guests at a dinner given before the dance by Thad. C. Bell of Richmond, Va. Covers were laid for twenty.

The Lusitania disaster will prevent Secretary Bryan from making a short visit here this week, as expected.

Mr. and Mrs. Erwin Stidder gave a dinner for six friends at the dinner dance at Battery Park Hotel last evening. Table decorations were tulips in unique designs.

Robert E. Bedell and E. E. Andrews, New York, are at Grove Park Inn. Paul Roebling, Bernardsville, N. J., is a guest of the Manor.

Revised Lists of Survivors Contain Names of 480 Passengers and Crew

The following are the latest lists of survivors given out by the Cunard Line. They are, of course, incomplete. In the case of the American lists, however, the names given total larger than the line's figures of all Americans aboard. This is explained by the fact that in sailing many passengers list themselves as from the port of departure rather than from their home town. The lists below contain the names of —— survivors:

CALLS SINKING NAVAL DUTY.

Frankfurter Zeitung Hails Act as "Extraordinary Success.

AMSTERDAM, (via London,) May 9.—The Frankfurter Zeitung comments thus on the sinking of the Lusitania:

"We feel it is always tragic and very hard when war arouses terror and causes wounds to those who do not carry its weapons. A German war vessel sank a ship. It did its duty.

"For the German Navy the sinking of the Lusitania means an extraordinary success. Its destruction demolished the last fable with which the people of England consoled themselves; on which hostile shipping relied when it dared to defy the German warnings."

GORHAM'S

It is peculiarly appropriate that your gift to the bride and groom should come from Gorham's—you cannot afford to be less auspicious than the occasion itself.

As for the silverware with which from time to time you enrich your own home, you surely should be quite as discriminating for yourself as you are for others.

Nowhere in the world can you even begin to match the splendors of Gorham selections, the originality of Gorham designs, nor supremacy and prestige of the Gorham name.

LAWMAKERS URGE NATION TO BE COOL

Wait for the Truth, Then Act Unitedly, Is Senator Lewis's Advice to the Country.

BLAMES WILSON'S CRITICS

Lusitania Disaster Will Make for Disarmament, Senator Sheppard Thinks—Trust the President.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, May 9.—In reply to your telegram asking me what I advise as the proper attitude of our country on the sinking of the Lusitania, I reply:

Our first duty in the presence of such a distracting disaster is to restrain the emotions of resentment and await a full report from official sources upon the cause and responsibility for the attack. We should not forget that we are to some degree responsible for this catastrophe. The too-frequent condemnation of the President and the Administration by hasty and excited gatherings, assembled in this country from time to time, on the neutrality policy of America, gave license to certain Governments in Europe to assume that anything done against the United States or its citizens by one of the belligerents would be treated by our people with indifference or approval. This has led to an incorrect view on the part of Europe as to what America would do if purposely wronged.

We must ascertain from Germany, and from all the facts, if it was the German Government or some irresponsible officers of the navy torpedo fleet that was responsible. We must not forget that Spain has ever denied that she as a Government ordered or had knowledge of the blowing up of the Maine. We went to war nevertheless. Now all admit that the United States, after investigation, cannot say how the Maine was exploded. It could have been done just as Spain said—by an over-ambitious officer seeking to commend himself by the act to his country for reward. The German Government at Berlin may make the same discovery and disown the act as a Government act and offer all proper reparation.

Only when this is declined should we take other steps. The nation must be now given to understand that if diplomacy through the President and the Secretary of State fails to obtain the reparation, the President is at the end of his power. He can then act only after obtaining the collective wisdom of the country through calling Congress together for any drastic action if such shall ever be necessary.

Our first attitude must be the true American one: Patience, investigation, so as to be assured of our ground, then make such demand as becomes a firm, courageous, but cool-headed, commonsense people.

Our duty is to wait for the truth, then act unitedly.

JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS,
Senator, Illinois.

Difenderfer Urges Caution.

JENKINTOWN, Penn., May 9.—Your telegram requesting my views regarding the attitude the United States should assume with reference to the sinking of the Lusitania received.

There can be but one answer, the positive assurance that this country shall remain neutral, no matter how trying, or how aggravating. These are times that try men's souls to the limit, but it is the true patriot who can weigh carefully the awful consequences of war and refrain from too hasty judgment. Having been a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee for the last four years, I may be in possession of some facts not in the possession of the public generally, but I have felt it my duty in all cases to refrain from making public statements that would in any way tend to inflame or show resentment.

The sinking of the Lusitania is an awful thing to contemplate, and the feeling of resentment may raise our blood to the boiling point, but let us place our confidence in the President of the United States. He has kept us free from entanglements so far. I for one have every confidence in his judgment.

R. E. DIFENDERFER,
Congressman.

Sheppard Trusts Wilson.

GEORGETOWN, Texas, May 9.—The sinking of the Lusitania is an illustration of the unspeakable horror of modern warfare, and will be a tremendous argument for general disarmament when the war closes. Let us handle the present situation with patience and calmness, trusting the President to take the proper course.

MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Senator from Texas.

Get the Facts—Senator E. D. Smith.

FLORENCE, S. C., May 9.—A thorough investigation of the facts and then take such action as the facts warrant and natonal dignity and national self-respect demand. I have implicit confidence in President Wilson's ability and patriotism to meet fully the situation.

E. D. SMITH,
Senator from South Carolina.

Folly in Haste, Says O'Gorman.

I prefer not to discuss the Lusitania tragedy, but every one should recognize the folly of urging hasty or precipitate action by our Government. The wisdom and patriotism of the President will safeguard every American interest. In my judgment, the situation does not call for the assembly of Congress.

JAMES A. O'GORMAN,
Senator from New York.

Shields Looks To The President.

WASHINGTON, May 9.—While upon the facts as they now appear, I think the destruction of the Lusitania and those aboard, common piracy and murder on the high seas, with the plainest principles of international law marekd only by the magnitude of the crime, and the cruel premeditation with which it was committed, I believe the course this country should pursue is one primarily for the President to determine, and that he should not be embarrassed in the discharge of his grave and delicate duty. I have great confidence in his wisdom, courage, and patriotism to do what is proper to protect the rights of the people, and the dignity of our Government.

JOHN K. SHIELDS,
Senator from Tennessee.

Congressman Hart's View.

HACKENSACK, N. J., May 9.—Representative Archibald C. Hart of the Sixth New Jersey District on being asked today what he thought of the Lusitania disaster made the following statement:

"As human being we must suffer mental distress when contemplating the destruction of the lives of non-combatants. Officially, our Government may find it more difficult to present a case in this than in the sinking of the Gulflight, an American ship, for it is said that the Lusitania, flying the flag of a belligerent, was armed and engaged in carrying contraband of war in the knowledge of its passengers. The truth or falsity of this must be influential. Yet it is inconceivable that any nation should purchase immunity from the bitter comparative harm that contraband could do it at such frightful expense.

"I believe that Congress will stand solidly behind our President, and that from him we may expect deliberate direction upon an honorable way."

VARDAMAN FINDS EXCUSES.

Senator Says Germans Gave Warning—Faith in Wilson.

Special to The New York Times.

COLUMBUS, Miss., May 9.—Senator James K. Vardaman of Mississippi, who stopped over here en route to Sheffield, where he goes to attend a meeting of the Tennessee River Improvement Association, when asked for an opinion regarding the Lusitania sinking, said:

"The incident is regrettable beyond expression, but I see no reason why serious complications between the United States and the belligerent Governments of Europe should grow out of it. It is one of the horrible incidents of a cruel, brutal, inexcusable, and indefensible war.

"Admitting that Germany is responsible for the destruction of the Lusitania, she is only guilty of retaliation for the damage to her own commerce by England.

"The German Government had declared the waters in which the Lusitania was destroyed in the war zone. As an additional warning to Americans, Germany published advertisements in both the American and British press warning neutrals against the use of belligerent ships. They disregarded them at their peril, and they must suffer the consequences.

"I wish from the depths of my heart that Americans would stay away from the war zone.

"No, I do not think that this one act would justify war, but President Wilson is on the job; he is in possession of all the facts, and I have faith in his prudence and good judgment in dealing with this delicate situation."

DEMANDS VENGEANCE.

Head of British Association Says Was Is the Only Logical Answer.

Special to The New York Times.

ATLANTA, Ga., May 9.—The United States must avenge the Americans lost with the Lusitania, according to Dr. Alexander Smellie, Chairman of the British Association of Atlanta.

"The hideous crime was carefully planned by Germany," said Dr. Smellie. "Never has there been a more horrible offense against humanity. If the positions of Great Britain and the United States were reversed, a tragedy like this could never happen to a British subject and its perpetrator go unpunished. If America were at war and England neutral, and an American vessel, with Britishers on board, were sunk under similar circumstances, England would bring the responsible country to account.

"It is a terrible thing to plunge a country into war, but in view of the atrocious nature of this latest crime, it is the only logical thing ha can be done."

NEED OF A SUBMARINE LAW.

Jefferson M. Levy Thinks Now Is the Time to Get It.

Speaking last night on the matter of the sinking of the Lusitania, ex-Congressman Jefferson M. Levy said:

"Whatever comes out of this fatality there must be hereafter a law of nations for submarine warfare. Thomas Jefferson said in 1803 that the battleship would have to go before the submarine, and he seems to be justified. We must have a law which is not only law such as we have had in the past, but also be a law which is enforcible. In other words, the nations must be absolutely bound by it.

"If Mr. Bryan, Secretary of State, and ex-President Taft would now come out in favor of a World Court Congress such as is to convene at Cleveland on next Wednesday—and the latter is so in favor of the plan that he has consented to address this congress in Cleveland—I believe that great strides can be made in international law; strides that shall forever settle the status of the submarine's actions.

"The sinking of the Lusitania makes such an indorsement timely. This is a matter which was to have been taken up at the scheduled meeting of The Hague Conference, called for last April. It can be taken up now. Already there is a strong sentiment among the eminent men of this country for a court in which sovereign States may be litigants, just as our own States may be litigants in our Supreme Court.

"Alton B. Parker, Bainbridge Colby and John Hays Hammond, among others, will be present to address this congress at Cleveland because they believe in its practicability. Here is an opportunity to settle for all future time what shall be enforcible law in crises of this kind."

CAUTIONS AMERICANS TO KEEP NEUTRALITY

London Observer Says Picking Up of the German Gauntlet Would Be a Blunder.

LONDON, May 9.—The Observer, in an editorial today on America and the Lusitania, says:

"The course which the American people can follow is by no means clear, and the obstacles in Mr. Wilson's path are so many and so dangerous that no one can fairly accuse him of pusillanimity if he decides that forcible action is denied to him.

"We shall certainly not rank ourselves among those who urge the United States to abandon their neutrality. They have every reason for prudent restraint. We can never be sufficiently grateful for the moral support which we have received from all that is great and worthiest in the American nation.

"It would, in our view, be a blunder if they permitted themselves in a moment of indignation to further the deep-laid plans of Germany by picking up the gauntlet thrown down to them. President Wilson is confronted with a very grave problem. What action he and his Government will think fit to take we do not know. Whatever it is, we shall accept it without any loss of respect for the great nation across the Atlantic."

POINTS "LARGER VENGEANCE."

British Writer Views America's War Power as Ethical.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, May 9.—A. H. Polled, writing in The London Sunday Times, says:

"As far as military conduct of the war is concerned, America's belligerency can affect it but little; but war is not only a matter of military operations. If America comes in it will not be on the ground that her national interests are endangered, nor yet because her nationals have been outraged. Her national interests are not in immediate danger. Her coming into the war could not protect other Americans, nor can she do much to avenge the outrage.

"A larger vengeance is in the hands of those who must dominate Germany, and in this task America can hardly help, but America's coming in would be like a judgment of posterity on the ethics which German kultur has put before the world. It would proclaim that the cause of the Allies is the cause of humanity. It would be a final condemnation of militarism. It would set a seal upon the patent necessity the world is under to purge itself of a plague centre which threatens all forms of life."

DENMARK HORROR-STRICKEN.

Copenhagen Newspapers Agree in Condemning Germany's Act.

COPENHAGEN, May 9, (via London.)—Commenting on the sinking of the Lusitania the Vortland today says:

"A cry of indignation will stir American public opinion while asking in the name of civilisation how a nation which on every occasion boasts of its culture can permit so many innocents to perish in such a terrible manner. A German torpedo struck the Lusitania, but simultaneously it drew human culture into the depths.

"However much the Germans in the future talk of their culture the answer will be, 'It does not exist; it committed suicide on May 7, 1915.'"

The National Tidende says:

"Even if the Lusitania were armed that does not justify or explain the torpedoing of the great liner without warning. Here is no question of accident. The Germans surely regret the loss of human lives. We others do not understand at all that this is necessary. We feel only a chilling horror."

The Politiken says:

"The act is a self-contradiction, as Germany by a mass of eager agitation tries to convince the world of the kindness and cleanness of its cause, and simultaneously resorts to a proceeding which is highly capable of strengthening the aversions whose existence the Germans recognize and which apparently is very disagreeable to them."

The Koebenhavn says:

"Will the German people like the responsibility for this drowning of innocent persons? If the German people do and dare take this responsibility we know no other answer thon that of 'terror!' The world is lying in darkness. Will it ever again become light?"

The Socialdemokraten says:

"All common sense and public spirit is shocked by this act in such a measure that we stand paralyzed by the shock of horror. No impartial person will understand how human beings have been able to carry out such an act. All those wishing peace must now meet the proof that war in the end can be but war with its blind madness."

FRENCH DEMAND REPRISALS.

Lusitania Leads War Comment—Press Looks to Us to Act.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, May 9.—The war news even from Italy gives place to the Lusitania. A significant feature of French comment is the demand for reprisals, which even the German use of asphyxiating gases failed to arouse. The press generally devotes the first two pages to the subject, emphasizing American opinion as shown in extracts from New York newspapers.

The French attitude is summed up in the prase: "It's up to America now."

The Petit Parisian says: "The world's eyes are on Washington. History's hour has sounded for President Wilson."

The Echo de Paris says: "What will America do, whose President has said the situation would become critical if one America life was sacrificed."

The Temps says: "After England, America now realizes that great countries lose nothing by military organization. There are many things even Germany would not have dared if she had not counted on the advantage of superior military preparation."

VIENNA PRESS REJOICES.

Sinking of Lusitania Is Regarded as an "Immense Success."

VENICE, (via London,) May 9.—All the Vienna newspapers publish the story of the torpedoing of the Lusitania and several of them comment editorially on the disaster. The Neue Freie Presse says:

"German submarines have registered an immense success. Perhaps Messrs. Churchill and Asquith will now speak less contemptuously of the German blockade and the dread of the submarines will increase still more.

"After the loss of the French cruiser Leon Gambetta comes the torpedoing of the Lusitania. It is not known if the ship was used as an auxiliary cruiser or whether she remained in the passenger service, but in any case she carried thousands of persons, and the sinking of the ship can hardly have occurred without great loss of life.

"We rejoice over this new success of the German Navy, which will show everywhere that as the allied armies in common attack have accomplished seemingly impossible deeds, so, also, the allied navies will go on with equal bravery to brilliant success.

"The sinking of the Leon Gambetta was in a purely military sense more important, but the destruction of a giant vessel costing millions is proof of the capacities of the submarine."

LACK OF AIR PATROL BLAMED.

Henry Woodhouse Says Two Aeroplanes Would Have Saved Liner.

The small investment of $20,000, the cost of two aeroplanes, would have saved the Lusitania, according to Henry Woodhouse, Governor of the Aero Club of America and managing editor of Flying.

"The fleets of the warring countries have been and are daily protected from submarine attacks by the seaplanes making thorough reconnoissances," he said yesterday, "and it has been found that they can detect submarines and mines and thereby keep the path of the fleets clear. This has been the case in the North Sea and during the campaign against the Dardanelles.

"All the British troops that have gone from England to France have been convoyed across the English Channel by seaplanes and dirigibles, and so effective have the aircraft been that not a single mishap has been recorded from the time of the sending over of the first drafts of the expeditionary forces up to the present time.

"Two submarines have already been destroyed by the bombs of seaplanes, and Sir John French and Vice Admiral de Robeck have expressed their regret that they can barely get enough aeroplanes for scouting and directing artillery fire, and cannot, therefore, employ some to extend the potentiality of ships and keep the coasts clear of hostile craft.

"With two aeroplanes the Lusitania would have made itself immune from submarine attack. The danger from submarines is a daylight danger near coasts, and this danger would easily be overcome by the employment of aircraft.

"The powerful seaplanes of today have been called the kingfishers of the submarine. They can be launched from a ship and sent to reconnoitre a hundred miles ahead, and upon finding a submarine can attack it with bombs and destroy it. The heads of the different forces in Europe recognize this potentiality, and while regretting that they do not have sufficient aeroplanes to employ some for this purpose, they keep their submarines out of reach of the enemies' aircraft.

"Torpedo launching by aeroplane is a new development not yet practiced in the war for the reason that the powers, needing aeroplanes in large numbers for other purposes, cannot allow their constructors and officers the time required to construct larger machines and conduct experiments to make it possible to launch full-sized torpedoes. But the feasibility of launching torpedoes with aeroplanes has been demonstrated by experiments made by Captain Alessandro Guidoni, Royal Italian Navy, at the arsenal at Spezia, Italy, and advocated in the United States by Rear Admiral Bradley A. Fiske, U. S. N.

"But the possibility of obtaining better results than are obtainable from a torpedo boat costing $1,000,000 with an aeroplane costing only about $15,000 has seemed too preposterous to be taken seriously by the bulk of naval authorities and neither of the above-mentioned officers received consideration until a few months ago. Captain Guidoni has succeeded in launching torpedoes weighing 700 pounds and hitting the target nine times out of ten from a distance of one and a half miles. When torpedo planes are put in use the status of things in naval warfare will change.

"The fact that the fleet assembling in New York waters has not a single aeroplane at its disposal and, on account of the discarding recently of three of the four naval aeroplanes which had become unfit for service the United States Navy has only one aeroplane fit for service, shows that the United States has not profited by Europe's mistakes. With one aeroplane in the navy, half a dozen in the army, and none of the 150 civil aviators experienced in long distance flying, this country would be in a sorrowful plight in case of its becoming a party in a war."

VOYAGERS' FRIENDS CLINGING TO HOPE

Futile Inquiries Made All Day at New York Offices of Cunard Line.

TWO BROTHERS ORPHANED

Cable Asks for Orders Regarding Saved Lads, Now Penniless in Liverpool.

There were only a few persons outside the Cunard Line offices at 22 State Street at 10 o'clock yesterday morning when the clerks arrived and opened the doors ready to receive inquirers who sought news of missing relatives or friends. Some of them were buoyed up with the hope that survivors might have been landed at remote points along the coast where they could not get in telephonic communication with the Cunard office at Queenstown to announce that they had been saved.

Among the first callers were Mr. and Mrs. Richard Hicksen of 657 Fifth Avenue who arrived in a big limousine car. They betrayed deep agitation when Mr. Hickson asked if anything had been heard of his two sisters, Mrs. Caroline Hickson Kennedy and Miss Kathryn Hickson, who was listed as Miss Kennedy. Neither of the women appeared on the list of Lusitania survivors.

The principal message received from Liverpool by the Cunard agents in the forenoon related entirely to the safety or loss of men of the crew of the Lusitania, from the Captain down to a bellboy.

Grief was expressed by the staff when it was officially announced that Staff Captain J. C. Anderson, Chief Engineer Alexander Bryce, Surgeon J. F. McDermott, Assistant Surgeon J. Garry, Purser James A. McCubbin, Deck Officer Stevens, and Extra Chief Steward Arthur Ford had gone down with the ship.

Another message related to the safety of two brothers, Erik and William Gardner, 16 and 11 years old, respectively, of Toronto, Canada. The parents, on their way with the boys to New Zealand, went down with the Lusitania. The message added that the boys were penniless at Liverpool, and the company officials cabled for instructions from New York as to what should be done with them.

Two Women Rescued.

An unofficial notice posted in the Cunard office stated private cablegrams had been received in Boston, addressed to relatives, that Ann Kilkenny and Margaret Touhey, both in the steerage, had been saved.

Among the relatives who sought news was Louis Friedman of 1,531 Fifty-first Street, Borough Park, Brooklyn, who said his brother Samuel of the firm of Friedman & Co., importers, at 421 Broadway, had not been reported saved.

Adolph Schwarz, a cloak importer, of 137 Madison Avenue, called to inquire about his brother, Max M. Schwarz, head of the firm, who sailed to buy goods.

Edward Cronican of 1,494 Amsterdam Avenue sought news of his adopted father, an uncle by marriage, Inspector Robert Henry Cannon, 50 years old, who is in the service of the British Government and whose duty was to search transatlantic travelers in efforts to safeguard the liners.

The Inspector was six feet four inches in height and a powerful swimmer and consequently may have made shore. He had received medals for bravery in just such calamities as befell the Lusitania. Bravery displayed on the Carpathia following the Titanic castastrophe caused Congress to bestow a medal on the Inspector. The night before the Lusitania sailed he remarked to Mr. Cronican that torpedoing the Lusitania was impossible as she was too fast.

Mrs. R. Scott of 884 East Nineteenth Street, Paterson, N. J., begged the Cunard officials for news of her brother, Edward Lawrenson, who had sailed for Lancashire after having amassed a fortune in British Columbia.

Seeks News of Husband.

Mrs. Davy Kinshott of 21 Vista Avenue, Dongan Hills, S. I., wife of an assistant steward, accompanied by her young son, stayed in the Cunard offices all day awaiting news of her husband.

Michael Molloy of 431 West Forty-seventh Street, whose sister, Miss Margaret Molloy of 429 West Forty-seventh Street, was a passenger, was accompanied by his cousin, Miss Katherine Flanagan. On April 25 he received a cablegram announcing the serious illness of his father, and Miss Molloy insisted on going to Ireland by the quickest steamship. On the Monday after she left he received a cablegram stating that the father had died.

A cablegram from the head office in Liverpool reported that the Cunarder Tuscania had not sailed for New York on Saturday, but did not give any reason for the delay. It was thought here that the company might be waiting for instructions from the Admiralty.

The office was closed at 8 o'clock at night leaving several grief-stricken persons standing in the hallway of the building, trying to cheer up one another.

William Marconi, the inventor, said yesterday that he had lost a friend on the Lusitania, Mrs. M. C. Brown of New York, who had sailed for Liverpool with her daughter, Mrs. A. S. Witherbee and Mrs. Witherbee's son 5 years old. Mrs. Witherbee had been reported saved but no word of the fate of her mother or her son has arrived here.

TERROR BRED IN GERMANY.

Norwegian Newspaper Places Blame for War's Ferocity.

CHRISTIANIA, Norway, May 9.—The Tidens Tegn, in its issue today, says:

"The world reads with horror of Germany's sinking of the Lusitania. It is Germany's fault that this war has a ferocity and terror before considered impossible.

"The impression made by this horrible event is not mitigated by the fact that one seeks vainly for its reason. No policy of neutrality can rule the feeling of mankind, and perhaps even Germany is not strong enough to dispense with the friendship of other nations."

VATICAN ORGAN PROTESTS.

Joins Whole Italian Press in Denouncing Attack on Lusitania.

ROME, May 9, (via Paris.)—The newspapers, without distinction as to politics, strongly criticise German methods in the sinking of the Lusitania. Even the Osservatore Romano, which, although it is the Vatican organ, has not previously concealed its German proclivities, despite the fact that the Vatican is neutral, joins in the universal protest of the Italian newspapers over the destruction of the liner.

The Messagero in its editorial today declares that the sinking of the Lusitania "is worse than a battle lost for Germany."

SWISS OPINION INDIGNANT.

Newspaper Asks How Can Opinion Be Neutral in Face of Such Crime.

GENEVA, Switzerland, May 9.—All the Swiss newspapers express indignation concerning the torpedoing of the Lusitania. The Tribune de Geneve says:

"How can our opinion remain neutral before such an abominable crime? Precisely because we are neutral we protest with all our force against this premeditated act of piracy. The cup has overflowed."

ATTACKS PRESIDENT AT GERMAN MEETING

Wilhelm Says the Dead Soldiers on Battlefields Ought to Haunt Him.

COMPARES HIM TO JUDAS

Orator Claiming Native Birth Says America Has Become a Hiss and a By-word in the World.

Frederick P. Wilhelm, who asserted that he was a native-born American citizen of a neutral disposition, denounced President Wilson at a mass meeting made up almost exclusively of Germans at the Cort Theatre last night. He said "the dead German soldiers of the Flanders battlefields ought to haunt the President of the United States, because he has permitted them to be killed with American-made arms and instruments of murder."

At one point in his speech Mr. Wilhelm urged that President Wilson was "betraying a friendly people with the kiss of a false neutrality," and most of those in the audience applauded loudly. The buz of comment that came when Mr. Wilhelm ended his speech revealed the fact that nearly all those present spoke German by preference or otherwise. It was said that many of them came from the German section of Hoboken.

The mass meeting was held under the auspices of "The American Truth Society," which was organized, it was stated, because American newspapers could not be relied upon to give correct news about the German cause. Jeremiah A. O'Leary, a lawyer, with an office at 38 Park Row, who acted as Chairman, urged that branches of the Truth Society be established in Hoboken at once, and in all cities of the United States where there was any considerable German population. He said the society hoped soon to be sponsor "for a real American newspaper" which would give its American readers for the first time a chance to see how, "in supporting the cause of the Allies," they have been made victims "of a false public opinion, built up by falsely colored articles in the American press."

Chairman O'Leary announced that next Sunday George Whitefield Mead would attempt, in a speech under the Truth Society's auspices, "to fix the moral and legal responsibility for the Lusitania horror." He intimated that this responsibility rested with England for provoking Germany by closing the North Sea to German commerce, and with the United States for its failure to prohibit the exportation of arms to the Allies.

Expunged a Sympathy Clause.

Resolutions brought forward by Thomas P. Tuite, contained a clause setting forth that "we deplore the fact that American lives have been lost by international lawlessness." This clause, however, was expunged by the Executive Committee of the Truth Society to whom the resolutions were submitted before they were placed before the audience. Those who voted in favor of striking out the claus ewere Mr. O'Leary, Charles Noonan, and Joseph Frey; composing a majority of the committee.

As read to the audience and passed unanimously the resolutions contained these provisions:

We deplore and condemn all international lawlessness. We hold that lawlessness in war breeds lawlessness in reprisal and therefore that British lawlessness in closing the North Sea, involving neutral rights generally, in changing the laws of contraband and the conditions of contraband after the war broke out, in seizing and in confiscating the cargo of the food ship Wilhelmina, consigned to the civil population of Germany, provoked Germany reprisals in return.

We deplore the destruction of American lives upon a British ship by a German submarine.

We deplore the exportation of arms and ammunition to any belligerent, particularly upon passenger ships, and under all circumstances we denounce the shipment of contraband of war in American bottoms to any belligerent nation.

We respectfully recommend that a conclave of the neutral powers be called by the United States to restore, by means of a more enlightened public opinion and by means of embargoes, if necessary, the prevalence of law, of natural rights of trade, and complete freedom of the seas.

We pledge our support to the President of the United States in every just, impartial and necessary step as a means of restoring law and order among the nations of the earth.

It was just after the members of the audience pledged their support to the President in every step to restore order that Mr. Wilhelm sought to place on Mr. Wilson's head the blame for the American lives sacrificed on the Lusitania.

Says "Wilson Tamely Submits."

"Our President has failed in two important particulars," he said, "and a condition has arisen in which we must fear that the ghosts of retributive justice will scourge us. Our President has insisted on carrying on a traffic in arms and ammunition against the dictates of morality and the high conscience of which Americans should be capable. On the other hand, there was a commerce that was right before God and that was legally right, right before man as well as God. This was the peaceable and peaceful commerce with Germany's civil population.

"President Wilson tamely submitted to British dictation in shutting off the commerce of a peaceful character which might have kept German women and children from starving to death, and he submitted to British dictation again when he permitted to go on this commerce in implements of murder. Thus the Germans in the trenches said they had no objection to being killed by American bullets if only America as a neutral nation would insist on seeing that the commerce was kept open which would keep their wives and children from starvation at home. And at home the German women said they would be willing to see America yield its neutral rights in a way to let them starve if America only would desist from forcing their husbands and fathers to die with made-in-America bullets.

"Both the soldiers at the front and the women and children at home arose in a united protest against the American policy that required both that the women and children starve, so far as America was concerned, and then that the soldiers die in fighting against American munitions.

Says "America Has Her Price."

"Our President is a psychological problem to me, a psychological conundrum for I regarded him before this war broke out as a man of scrupulous honesty. Yet he has permitted his Administration to argue that because international law did not explicitly forbid the exportation of arms, international law commanded the exportation of the implements of murder. As well say that international law, which did not forbid the war, in consequence, commanded it.

"I am puzzled at our President, and I am perplexed at his present actions. I can no longer follow his ethics, he is an enigma. We are letting America become a hiss and a byword in the world and letting the people of the world say everywhere, 'America has her price—for money she will sell instruments of murder.' I say we must rise as Americans and end this murderous traffic."

WILSON CALMLY CONSIDERS ACTION

ing here, even outside the Administration, accords with that manifested in other parts of the country, that Mr. Wilson should be trusted to determine on the course to follow and to reach that determination in his own way.

President Remains Alone.

Secretary Bryan, who said yesterday that he had not communicated with the President since the Lusitania disaster, did not see Mr. Wilson today. Mr. Bryan's statement applies to each of the other members of the Cabinet. The President is struggling with the problem without assistance. He has virtually cut himself off from all communication with members of his Administration, with the object, it is believed, of having a chance to consider every aspect of the situation without the confusion that might come from hearing diverse views. When he has completed this period of contemplation, it is believed, he will lay his ideas before the members of his Cabinet and listen to the views that they may have to express before deciding on the character of the representations to be made to Germany.

Following his custom, the President went to the Central Presbyterian Church this morning. At 2 o'clock this afternoon he went motoring alone, and remained away from the White House for three and a half hours. He did not remain long indoors, but took another motor ride soon thereafter that kept him out until dark. There were no visitors at the White House during the day. Nothing that took place in Washington today served to give the impression that there was any feeling of excitement or concern here. The weather was perfect and thousands of people were on the streets and in the many parks of the capital. But nowhere was there evidence of agitation or interest based on the idea that the Government was facing a crisis over the Lusitania affair. Groups of persons, out for a Sunday holiday, walked through the White House grounds and gazed at the old mansion. There was nothing to indicate, however, that these were not of the ordinary run of visitors, taking advantage of the fine weather to stroll that way.

Gets Many Messages.

None of the many messages that have been received at the White House offering advice to the President with reference to the Lusitania incident will be made public. It was said that a considerable number of these reflected the opinion that the President should be trusted by the country to take the proper attitude in dealing with the situation. Some messages of the same character have been received at the State Department, addressed to Secretary Bryan.

On the whole the Administration is understood to be pleased with the tone of the sentiments expressed by Senators and Representatives, most of whom have either indicated a willingness to trust to the President's judgment or have declined to make any comment whatever. Ex-President Taft's cautious remarks and the refusal of ex-Senator Root to give his views have caused gratification in Administration circles.

Whether the President will refer to the Lusitania incident in the speech he is to deliver in Philadelphia tomorrow night has not been disclosed by any of those in a position to know what the President intends to say.

It is realized that the occasion will afford opportunity for display of feeling on the part of his audience, but nobody knows, of course, what will happen. The visit of the President to Philadelphia is to attend a gathering in celebration of the naturalization of 4,000 foreign-born citizens, and it is expected that these, with the members of their families, who are also to participate in the affair, will fill Convention Hall, which has a capacity of 12,000.

The President will leave here tomorrow afternoon, and is due to reach Philadelphia at 7 o'clock. He will go from the railway station to Convention Hall, and expects to return to his train after the exercises there. His train is scheduled to leave Philadelphia on the return trip at midnight.

Malone Reports No Guns.

The official statement from Berlin, which came by wireless, admitting that a German submarine had sunk the Lusitania, and pointing out that the big liner was naturally armed with guns, was widely commented upon here today. Dudley Field Malone, Collector of the Port of New York, has reported to the authorities here that the Lusitania had no guns aboard.

Series of Big Problems.

President Wilson during the last twenty-four hours has been studying every aspect of the Lusitania tragedy from its legal and humanitarian aspects. That he feels deeply distressed over the incident and realizes the people of the United States expect him to express in some pronounced fashion their indignation over it was indicated by the statement issued from the White House on Saturday night.

Only the President's most intimate advisers know of the complexities of the problem before him. It not only concerns the attack on the Lusitania with nearly 200 Americans on board, but a series of incidents indicating a period of strained relations with Germany for many weeks.

The President has watched without open comment, but it is known with disapproval the complaints of the German oficals with regard to questions of neutrality and the efforts to array German-American sentiment against the Washington Administration as a means of urging an embargo on munitions of war against the Allies. At first the German Government admitted that there was no violation of international aw in the sale by private individuals of munitions of war. The German Ambassador in a memorandum practically accused the United States Government of not being neutral in the question of permitting shipments of munitions, the President was amazed.

Seeks Motive for Acts.

The sinking of the American ship Frye, the attack on the Falaba, which caused the drowning of an American citizen, Leon C. Thresher; the wrecking without warning of the American tank ship Gulflight, the dropping of bombs on the American steamer Cushing, and, finally, the torpedoing of the giant liner Lusitania constitute a series of incidents which the President is trying to interpret. He wants to be certain whether they range themselves in order to cause a grave climax of a carefully planned policy of hostility to the United States, or whether the sequence is casual and the German Government desires to continue friendly relations with the Washington Government.

If the German Government, as not a few diplomatists and officials fear, is anxious to draw the United States into the European conflict in the hope that defense at home will reduce the supply of arms to the Allies some officials believe the situation must be considered in the light of other possibilities and incidents in the future which might be calculated to aggravate public feeling in the United States.

In every quarter the opinion prevailed that the President was confronted with not only the most serious problem of his own career, but one of the most trying and awkward situations in the history of the United States. In patient expectancy official Washington awaits the President's decision.

Neutrals Watch Us.

"Neutral Governments are anxious to know what the course of the United States will be. They have frequently intimated to the American Government their willingness to join in any movement which might effectively protect the rights of neutrals. They have promised their moral support, and, while the United States traditionally has been opposed to joint action of any kind, some observers think a contingency might arise, as the international situation develops, which may make necessary conversations with the neutral countries on a common policy to safeguard the rights of neutrals.

Most of the time today the President seemed preoccupied, and talked little to his companions. He sat in his study, it was said, in deep thought, undisturbed for hours. When he returned from his motor trip today he found on his desk another great pile of telegrams.

They had been coming in scores from all parts of the country. Many urged the adoption of severe measures. A few from workingmen's organizations advised a declaration of war as the surest preventive of further affronts to American dignity. Others suggested a severance of all diplomatic relations until adequate reparation and apology was made. Still others counseled a peaceful course, but advocated firmness.

VON BERNSTORFF GETS A BOMB THREAT

Anonymons Writer Sends Warning That the Embassy Is to Be Blown Up.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, May 9.—It was said at the German Embassy today in response to inquiries that an anonymous letter had been received there threatening that the Embassy would be blown up at 1:32 o'clock on Monday morning. A copy of this communication, substantially the same as the one delivered at the German Embassy, was received by a newspaper, and this caused the inquiries.

Count von Bernstorff said such a letter had come to the Embassy this morning. He indicated that he did not take it seriously, saying that he would be in bed and asleep at the hour named in the letter. The letter, which was typewritten, was on paper with a water mark showing the American Eagle and Shield of the United States, and is said to be similar to that used in the Government departments, but no significance was attached to this at the Embassy, where it was regarded as the work of a crank. The letter was as follows:

"You will be blow up tonight at 1:32 o'clock. An American."

On their own initiative, the Washington police authorities have placed a guard around the German Embassy. According to the police, no request for protection had been received from the Embassy, and the guard was placed there merely as a matter of ordinary precaution. Major Pullman, the Superintendent of Police, said it was customary for the Washington police to look especially after the protection of embassies and legation here, and that this protection was just such as the United States would expect the police of foreign capitals to afford to representatives of this Government.

Count von Bernstorff reiterated today what he said on leaving New York yesterday, to the effect that he could not discuss the Lusitania tragedy because he had nothing official from his Government on the subject. He knew nothing of the sinking of the vessel except what he had seen in newspapers, he said. A statement from Berlin issued by the German Government appeared in newspapers this morning, the Ambassador said, and he could add nothing to that. In this statement attention was called to the Embassy's warnings to Americans not to take passage on ships of Germany's enemies.

The Ambassador denied that he had advance knowledge of any intention to sink the Lusitania. Had he known it in advance, he said, he could have gone no further than he had gone in giving notice in a newspaer advertisement of the danger of travel through the waters of the war zone in vessels of nations at war with Germany.

In connection with the warning advertisement attention has been called to the fact that the advertisement was general in its terms and made no reference to the Lusitania. It is pointed out also that the advertisement did not appear in newspapers until the morning of the day the Lusitania sailed and it has been contended that it was printed without any marked prominence and in such positions as to leave perspective passengers on the Lusitania to take their chance of finding it in the general run of printed matter.

It is understood that the German explanation of the fact that the advertisement was not printed until the morning of the day of the Lusitania's sailing is that the publication of the advertisement was to have been a week in advance of the date of the sailing of the Lusitania, and that the delay in publication was due to an error for which the German Embassy was not responsible. Owing to this error, according to the understood explanation, the simultaneous publication could not be arranged for a date prior to Saturday, May 1, when the Lusitania sailed from New York. The copy of the advertisement prepared at the German Embassy is said to have been given on April 22 to the agency which placed the advertising, with instructions to arrange for its first publication on May 1.

Persons disposed to criticise the attitude of the German Embassy contend that the denial of Count Bernstorff that he had advance knowledge of any intention on the part of the German Government to sink the Lusitania, reduces the element of warning on which the German Government is laying so much stress. Itis argued that if the warning was not intended to apply directly to the Lusitania, and all the time the German Government contemplated the sinking of that ship the contention that the American passengers on the Lusitania must have understood that the warning was intended to apply to them will not bear scrutiny.

FEAR WIRELESS TRAP CAUGHT LUSITANIA

Close Scrutiny of All Messages at Two German Stations Called For.

SHIP'S FATE FORESHADOWED

F. K. Sprague, Charles Curtis, and Brander Matthews Discuss German Embassy's Significant Warnings.

The necessity of a Federal investigation to ascertain whether the German Government has abused the privilege granted Germany by the United States in the transmission of messages by wireless directly from one country to the other during the war was discussed last night by Professor Brander Matthews of Columbia, Frank J. Sprague, electrical engineer, and Charles Curtis, the builder of steamship turbines, at Professor Matthews's home at 337 West Eighty-seventh Street. They agreed that in his investigation of the circumstances surrounding the sinking of the Lusitania by a German submarine and the killing of more than 100 Americans President Wilson should demand that every message sent either to or from Germany during the last few weeks should be submitted to him for scrutiny, and if in code should be translated.

Mr. Sprague, who was formerly President of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers and has been called the father of electric railways, laid stress on the fact that the German Embassy at Washington was in possession of knowledge previous to the last sailing of the Lusitania that on this trip it would be subjected to special and unusual hazard, as indicated by the fact that the Embassy advertised a warning to passengers on the day of sailing. He thought it not improbable, he said, that information making it possible for the German submarines to "ambush" the Lusitania at the time she neared the British coast had actually been sent from this country, and that the number of rumors in certain circles here which presaged the catastrophe might indicate that there was definite "inside" knowledge of the attempt in this country to be made.

Lusitania's Peril Known.

The Government investigation, he said, should include an effort to trace this inside information to its sources with the view to learning if the Germans were aided in such manner by persons in a neutral country, and he declared that an effort should be made to trace every one of the anonymous telegrams of warning received by Lusitania passengers through the telegraph offices to their sources.

"President Wilson is in a most difficult position, and, in a period of righteous indignation throughout the country at what is the most diabolical ace ever committed during any war, is seeking all possible knowledge of the exact facts connected with the case before committing this Government to whatever steps seem wise to him in upholding the country's honor," said Mr. Sprague after the discussion. "In his conclusions all good citizens must uphold his hands.

"But in searching out the facts, one thing must not be lost sight of—the use to which wireless channels communicating between the United States and Germany, by way of Tuckerton and Sayville, have been put during the past few weeks. The United States, in its desire to afford all facilities which a reasonable regard to neutrality might demand, has recently permitting the enlarging of the Sayville wireless station so that it may not only receive but may transmit direct to Germany—a privilege which it is inconceivable Germany would permit on its own territory under the existing circumstances.

Messages May Have Been in Code.

"Many of the messages sent and received have undoubtedly been in code, and it is possible that such code, always subject to change, may not, at all times have been available to any censors put at those stations by the United States Government. These censors were primarily placed there, I understand, to prevent the use of the stations for communication to or from ships at sea on matters connected with the supply or movement of armed vessels.

"It is significant that, simultaneously with the last sailing of the Lusitania, although the United States Government had notified Germany that she would be held to strict accountability if American ships or lives were lost by reason of her proclaimed submarine activities, there was published under the authority of the Imperial eGrman Embasy an advertisement renewing the exact threat made by the German Government, and at the same time many anonymous telegrams were received by passenger on board that ship warning them not to sail.

"No such advertisement and no such telegrams had marked any previous sailing of that ship. It is currently reported that there were many sinister rumors concerning the fate of the Lusitania on this trip. It would appear almost certain that the German Government decided not only to ignore all the American protests, but to make a special effort on this particular trip to sink the Lusitania and inaugurate a new era of 'frightfulness,' and in such manner as to produce the maximum of horrible effect. The evidence of this was shown when the ship was torpedoed, for even after one missile had reached home and the ship was mortally wounded, a second, and from some reports it appears a third, torpedo was sent into her so that the ship was sunk with the maximum loss of life. It must be remembered that the submarines made no attempt to save life.

Did Embassy Know in Advance?

"The conclusion is almost irresistible that special knowledge was possessed by the German Embassy and perhaps by others of what was to come.

"It would seem proper, while the President is seeking the facts in the case, that he should be satisfied as to the exact character of every wireless communication that has passed through either wireless station in the last few weeks. It may be that the stations' records will tell their own story, and it may be that that story will form no basis for a charge that unneutral and unfriendly use has been made of them.

"But if there should be any doubt, and if the German Embassy or any representative of the German Government has received or sent messages, not examined, under the courtesy of private codes and should refuse a demand by the President for detailed knowledge as to the messages sent and received, it would seem justifiable to conclude that representatives of the German Government have been directly, and perhaps criminally, connected with the carrying out of this fearful attack. The President should have this information in hand in deciding upon the proper course for this Government to follow at the present critical time."

HOW VANDERBILT AND OTHERS DIED

Lady Mackworth. When the deck became awash I jumped into the sea with a lifebelt. After a terrible buffeting from the wreckage I felt myself becoming unconscious.

Collapsible Boats Most Useful.

"I resigned myself to fate, feeling sure that I would drown. When I revived I found myself on a collapsible boat, where I had been dragged while unconscious. I believe these collapsible boats saved more lives than did the regular lifeboats. The latter could not be launched in time, and many of them were smashed or upset by the davits. I know that two lifeboats were launched on the port side."

Mrs. Albert G. Bilicke of Los Angeles was rescued with Miss Connor.

No trace has yet been found of the two daughters, Anna and Gwen, of Lady Allan of Montreal. Their mother, who is the wife of Sir Montague Allan, a Director of the Allan Line, is prostrated with grief and unable to see any one.

Lindell Bates, a brother of Lindon Bates, Jr., of New York, arrived in Queenstown today, seeking Lindon.

A number of identified dead, including probably several Americans, will be buried on Monday. The funeral will be public, and there will be a military and naval escort.

Bodies Identified.

The body of Mme. Marie Depage, wife of Dr. Antoine Depage, Medical Director of the Belgian Red Cross, is among the identified dead. Mme. Depage recently lectured in the United States on conditions in Belgium, and collected funds for the sufferers of her country.

Among the American identified dead is the body of the Rev. Orr Jacobus.

Additional names of identified American dead were ascertained today, as follows:

Hugh Compton, age 17, son of the President of the Booth Line.

J. B. Turnbull, Bridgeport, Conn.

Edward Ellis, New York City.

W. Walker, presumably of New York.

Miss McBright, 3 East Ninth Street, New York.

The Lord Mayor of Cork called yesterday upon the United States Consul at Queenstown and tendered his own sympathy and that of the citizens of the city to the families and relatives of Americans drowned in the Lusitania disaster.

A special train left Queenstown last night for Dublin carrying many of the survivors who are able to travel. Many pathetic scenes were enacted at the railroad station when persons who had lost relatives or friends boarded the train. Some of the survivors appeared still obsessed by the terrifying ordeal through which they had passed. Everything possible was done for their comfort by the people of Cork.

Wesley Frost, United States Consul at Cork, is obtaining affidavits concerning all the material facts of the torpedoing of the Lusitania from Miss Jessie Taft Smith of Braceville, Ohio; Dr. Howard L. Fisher of New York, and Robert Rankin of New York.

These survivors will cable to the State Department at Washington about 300 words each.

Survivors Disagree.

The survivors do not agree as to whether the submarine fired one or two torpedoes. A few say they saw the periscope, though many attest to tracing the wake of foam as a projectile came toward the vessel. The only point in which all concur is that the torpedo struck the vessel a vital blow amidships, causing her to list almost immediately to the starboard. In this careening fashion she plowed forward some distance, smashing the lifeboats' davits as she did so and making the launching of boats well-nigh impossible until headway had ceased.

How far the Lusitania struggled forward after being struck and how long it was before she disappeared beneath the waves are likewise points upon which few passengers agree, estimates of the time she remained afloat ranging from eight to twenty minutes. At any rate, the list to starboard so elevated the lifeboats on the port side as soon to render them useless, and it is said only two on that side were launched.

The first of these, according to the custom of the sea, was filled with women and children. It struck the water unevenly, capsizing and throwing its sixty occupants into the sea.

Women and Children Drown.

The Lusitania even then was making considerable headway, and these women and little children were swept to death, in spite of the attempts of two stokers to rescue them. These stokers, according to the passengers, were drowned.

After that several boats were launched successfully, but the liner's list grew more perilous, the decks slanting to such an angle it was imperative for all to cling to the starboard rail. Many by this time had donned lifebelts and jumped. Several lifeboats broke adrift unoccupied, and the sea became a froth of oars, chairs, débris, and human bodies.

Two stokers, seeing a drifting boat, dived overboard, recovered it, and pulled in nearly forty persons, mostly women. The Lusitania's crew, meanwhile, adhered to the letter to the instructions which had been given them, and the discipline was rigid, although one or two subordinate officers are said to have told a group of passengers who had climbed into a boat that there was no immediate danger, and advised them to remain on deck a while longer. Whether this was due to the fact that these subordinates lost their heads or to their conviction that the ship's bulkheads would save her never will be determined, but that such an incident occurred is attested by Ernest Townley, a resident of Surbiton, England, who was returning from a business trip in America.

Survivors Dazed and Confused.

All day yesterday, in hotel corridors, halls, and reception rooms, survivors sat listlessly still, too dazed to discuss what had occurred. They were dressed in a variety of garments. Some were crying softly; some were trying to force down beef tea or other nourishment. In front a crowd surged, clamoring for news of father, mother, brother, or sister.

Further down the street a crowd crammed the small Government telegraph office, where three clerks and three operators strove desperately to keep abreast of the ever-growing stream of messages.

In four morgues lay the dead, women in some cases side by side with children. The body of Charles Frohman, the clothing water soaked but his features placid, lay face upward in a bare room in an old building on the hillside, a hundred yards from the water's edge. Around him were ranged fifty bodies of both sexes, over which attendants were bending, sorting and ticketing their belongings.

Those men best fitted to chronicle the last moments of the Lusitania, Elbert Hubbard, Justus Miles Forman, Charles Frohman, Alfred Gwynne Vanderbilt, and others, apparently all went to their graves with her.

Cunard Officials' Views.

Her speed at the time she was struck is variously estimated from eight to twenty-one knots. When forced, the liner could do twenty-five knots, outstripping even the fastest and latest submarines, hence it is the belief of survivors and Cunard Line officials that a battery of underwater craft, numbering perhaps four or five, lay in wait, in the clear sunshine of Friday, posted advantageously along the route it was surmised the vessel would take. It was easy to keep all but the tips of the periscopes submerged, and then for the craft nearest her to let go torpedoes.

The first train to arrive here yesterday morning carried attachés of the main Cunard Line offices at Liverpool, including Captain William Dodd, the Marine Superintendent, and Dr. Duncan Morgan, the Medical Superintendent. The former busied himself with relieving the material wants of surviving passengers and crew and the identification of the dead, while the latter attended the injured, several of whom were suffering from severe wounds and shock.

Every train for Kingstown and Rosslare carried complements of second and third class passengers and members of the crew. Most of the first-cabin survivors—sadly few in number—will remain here temporarily. The townspeople have been generous in extending aid and sympathy to the survivors, none of whom was able to save more than the clothes on his back. Many are dressed as they would have been as if the disaster had occurred at night, for the explosion and the long struggle in the water virtually denuded them.

Captain Turner appeared yesterday morning in civilian clothes, donated by a local banker, who has extended the hospitality of his home to the commander. Later in the day he dressed in the stained uniform, which had been dried, and walked with bowed head down the streets, recognized by few among the crowds.

Queenstown Questions.

Queenstown was almost as much dazed by the tragedy as those aboard the Lusitania. The question on every lip is, "Why did Captain Turner pursue the usual well-known Cunard Line course so close to the Irish coast at medium speed, and why was not the big liner convoyed?"

Several naval officers here state that the Lusitania received wireless orders to take a course in the middle channel, but the ship's wireless operator declines to say whether or not he received such orders.

All day long morbid crowds surrounded the temporary morgues where the bodies of 149 victims await identification. Although few have been identified, many bear evidence of having occupied the first-class cabin. In striking contrast to most historic sea disasters, the rate of mortality among first-class passengers seems to be heavier than among any other class on board. A large proportion of those saved are members of the crew, but this is not evidence of lack of discipline, as most of them were picked up from the water.

The Captain of a trawler who arrived in the harbor soon after the accident with 146 survivors, mostly women and children, when reproached for not staying longer on the chance of picking up more survivors, said:

"There were many left in the water, but they were all dead and many so horribly mangled I thought it better to bring ashore my boatload of suffering women, as they could not have stood much more."

These women presented a pitiful sight as they wandered aimlessly about searching without hope for loved ones who must have gone down with the ship.

Relatives and Friends Arrive.

Relatives and friends of passengers who had gone in high spirits to Liverpool to meet the incoming ship began to arrive here yesterday to search for the missing, but the small roll of survivors meant heart-breaking disappointment for most of them. Among the number was William Crichton, a prominent business man in London and a former resident of Baltimore, who searched in vain among the survivors and in the morgues for a trace of his wife.

The dragging of lifeboats was explained by a number of passengers and members of the crew by the statement that the second torpedo severed several steam pipes from the engines. The Lusitania had been sent full speed ahead when the first torpedo was seen, and it was impossible to stop her headway by reversing the engines when the necessity for lowering the boats was realized.

The most remarkable escape was that of R. J. Timmis of Gainesville, Texas, who was returning to England for his yearly visit, accompanied by his chum, R. T. Moodie, also of Gainesville. Both men gave their lifebelts to steerage women just as the Lusitania sank. Timmis, who is a strong swimmer, remained in the water, clinging to various objects, for nearly three hours. Then he was taken into a boat, which he still had the strength to assist in rowing.

The boat began picking up from the water all those showing signs of life, and the first person rescued was the half-conscious steerage woman to whom Timmis had given his lifebelt. Moodie sank when the ship went under, and, although he was a good swimmer, he was not seen again. Moodie was all ready to jump when Timmis, who previously had given his belt to a woman, said: "There is a steerage woman here with a 6 months' old baby." Moodie promptly stripped off his lifebelt, but it seems both he and the woman perished.

Little Fear at First Shock.

Dr. J. T. Houghton of Troy, N. Y., one of the survivors, said there was no reason to fear any danger after the first explosion, as it was believed the vessel would be headed for Queenstown and beached, if necessary. Just then, said Dr. Houghton, the liner was again struck, evidently in a more vital spot, for it began to settle rapidly. Orders then came from the bridge to lower all boats. A near panic took possession of the women. People were rushed into the boats, some of which were launched successfully, others not so successfully.

G. D. Lane, a youthful but cool-headed second-cabin passenger, who was returning to Wales from New York, was in a lifeboat which was capsized by the davits as the Lusitania heeled over.

"I was on the 'B' deck," he said, "when I saw the wake of the torpedo. I hardly realized what it meant when the big ship seemed to stagger, and almost immediately listed to starboard. I rushed to get a lifebelt, but stopped to help get children on the boat deck. The second cabin was a veritable nursery. Many youngsters must have drowned, but I had the satisfaction of seeing one boat get away filled with women and children. When the water reached the deck I saw another lifeboat with a vacant seat, which I took, as no one else was in sight, but we were too late. The Lusitania reeled so suddenly our boat was swamped, but we righted her again.

"We witnessed the most horrible scene of human futility it is possible to imagine. When the Lusitania had turned almost over she suddenly plunged bow foremost into the water, leaving her stern high in the air. People on the aft deck were fighting with wild desperation to retain a footing on the almost perpendicular deck while they fell over the slippery stern like crippled flies. Their cries and shrieks could be heard above the hiss of escaping steam and the crash of bursting boilers. Then the water mercifully closed over them and the big liner disappeared, leaving scarcely a ripple behind her.

Twelve Lifeboats Afloat.

"Twelve lifeboats were all that were left of our floating home. In a time which could be measured by seconds swimmers, bodies, and wreckage appeared in the space where she went down. We were almost exhausted by the work of rescue when taken aboard a trawler. It all seems like a horrible dream now."

William McM. Adams of Boston, son of A. H. Adams, European manager of the United States Rubber Company, with offices in London, was standing on the Lusitania's deck with his father and near Lady Allan of Montreal and her two daughters, Anna and Gwen, and Mrs. G. W. Stephens of Montreal. All the members of this group got into a lifeboat, but it was smashed, throwing all the occupants into the water.

"The Lusitania heeled over," said Mr. Adams today. "I was struck by a mast, and the same blow evidently sent my father to the bottom and also hit Lady Allan, who suffered a broken collarbone and injuries to one of her hips and her spine.

"I must have gone down with the suction of the ship, but regained the surface of the water and was picked up, half conscious, and taken aboard a trawler."

First Rescuer's Story.

Captain David Murphy of the trawler Stormcock was first on the scene with a rescue boat. His story follows:

"First of all I gathered in a lifeboat fifty-two persons, most of them women and children, and before I completed my load I had twenty blessed youngsters aboard the old Stormcock. Several of them were without their mothers, but all were taken in charge before we reached harbor by kindly women, who forgot their own sorrows in ministering to others.

"One old lady of 78 years had been in the water two hours, but was as spry as any one. Many women fainted on reaching our decks, and when revived begged pitifully to be allowed to retain their lifebelts, as they were overmastered by the fear that the submarine would return to complete its work of destruction. Several died aboard my boat, and the scenes of grief and suffering became almost unbearable. The little Stormcock brought 150 persons to Queenstown."

Master at Arms Williams of the Lusitania is the proudest member of the remnant of the crew, for it was his keen eye which caught the flash of gold braid on Captain Turner's arm when the commander was about to throw up his hands after being in the water two hours and a half.

Hope dies hard in the human heart, and friends and relatives of the missing are running down rumors that several boatloads of survivors have been landed in remote coves on the Irish coast, while two schooners which took part in the work are said to have sailed for Liverpool with a number of rescued aboard.

Although all the passengers discussed submarines all the way over few, if any, believed that the Lusitania would be struck. They referred to the possibility almost with levity. R. J. Timmis, who talked with Captain Turner after landing, stated that the Captain said bitterly:

"We didn't have a chance. I knew that when I felt the torpedo's impact."

Mr. Timmis added that the Captain told the helmsman and Staff Captain on the bridge to save themselves, but Captain Turner remained at his post. The Staff Captain was lost, but the helmsman was saved.

The Mnster and Leinster Bank of Cork telegraphed United States Consul Frost here in behalf of a New York bank urging that every effort be made and that no expense be spared in tracing Alfred G. Vanderbilt.

Major F. U. Pearl was saved, with his two children, but his 12-year-old son lies in a morgue and his fourth son is missing.

The bodies of Charles Frohman, Mrs. May Brown, and Mrs. MacDona were taken in charge by the American Consulate last night.

The Cunard Line has a boat patrolling the spot where the liner sank in the hope that it may pick up a few stragglers.

At the beginning of the inquest yesterday the Coroner spoke at considerable length, denouncing the Germans. He said he hoped all victims buried here would receive full military honors.

TO SEEK VANDERBILT'S BODY.

Ambassador Page Asked to Send Tug—No Hint as to Will.

The flags on the Hotel Vanderbilt flew at half-staff yesterday while Mrs. Alfred Gwynne Vanderbilt waited at the home of Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, 1 West Fifty-seventh Street, for news of her husband—that he was alive, that some one had actually seen him drown, or that his body had been found. No news came.

Mrs. Vanderbilt, it was said, was suffering greatly under the suspense. She has left her apartment in the Hotel Vanderbilt and will remain with her mother-in-law for the present.

Those closest to Mr. Vanderbilt, outside of his family, have accepted his death as a fact, as is indicated by the lowering of the flags on the hotel. The concern of Mr. Vanderbilt's friends now is over the recovery of his body, and special efforts to this end are being made. Charles E. Crocker, Mr. Vanderbilt's secretary, in Mrs. Vanderbilt's name, sent a cablegram yesterday through Washington to Ambassador Page, asking that a tug be chartered for a search for the body, and it is expected that the vessel will go out today.

Mr. Crocker said yesterday that no steps toward the disposition of Mr. Vanderbilt's property would be taken until definite word concerning Mr. Vanderbilt had been received or a sufficient time had elapsed to put the fact of his death beyond doubt. This means, it is said, that Mr. Vanderbilt's will will not be read until next week, at least. No one could be found yesterday who would attempt to estimate his property or guess at the disposal of it. It is presumed that the bulk of his estate will go to his wife and children, but large bequests to charity are expected by some.

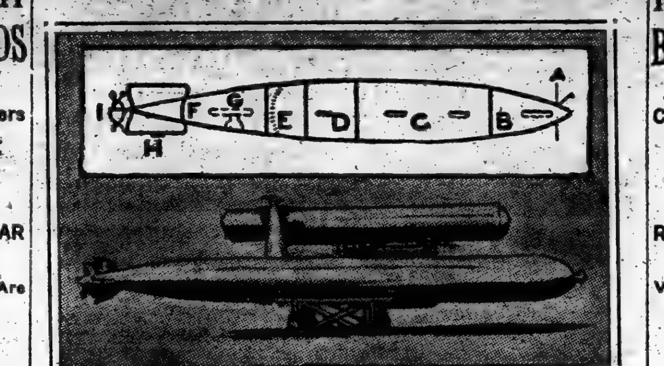
40-KNOT TORPEDO HIT LINER AT 1,000 YARDS

United States Naval Officers Now Here Discuss Sinking of the Lusitania.

NO TWO EXACTLY SIMILAR

Peculiarities of Each Missile Are Recorded on History Sheet—Its Construction.

TYPE OF TORPEDO USED IN SUBMARINE WARFARE.



Sketch shows the essential parts of a Whitehead torpedo. A: Pistol, detonator, primer, which causes the explosion of "B" when the torpedo strikes an object. B. Explosive head, filled with wet guncotton. (The "war-head" is substituted by a weighty dummy during practice.) C. Air chamber with compressed air, at a pressure of approximately 1,350 pounds per square inch, for action. The chamber is tested to stand a pressure of 1,700 pounds per square inch. D. Balance chamber, containing mechanism for regulating the depth of submergence at which the torpedo is adjusted to run. E. Engine room, containing propelling machinery (I. H. P. 60 in latest 18-inch type.) F. Buoyancy chamber—a practically empty chamber—to give the necessary buoyancy to the torpedo. G. Gyroscope. An instrument for correcting any deviation of the torpedo from the line of fire. H. Rudders, and mechanism for operating. I. Twin-screws, operating "clockwise" and "anti-clockwise."

The German torpedo or torpedoes that destroyed the Lusitania were fired at a range of not more than 1,000 yards, and the torpedoes themselves probably traveled at a speed in excess of forty knots. The submarine or submarines from which the weapons were discharged were submerged not more than fifteen feet, and they had plenty of time to get the exact range before the torpedoes were discharged. Furthermore, the torpedoes were of the most modern and powerful type and of the highest possible speed.

That is the opinion of many of the officers of the torpedo flotillas now in the Hudson River, all of whom have closely followed the German submarine activities since the under-water war against belligerent and neutral commerce was started by the Germans several months ago.

The extreme range of a torpedo, it was explained by these officers, is about 4,000 yards; but the evidence to be had indicates that all the German submarine work is being done at short range, perhaps less than 1,000 yards. At the less range the speed of the torpedo is greater and the aim correspondingly more accurate. At the 4,000-yard range the speed of a modern torpedo should be between 27 and 30 knots; at 3,000 yards about 32 knots, and at 2,000 yards between 33 and 36 knots. At less ranges the speed may vary from 35 to more than 40 knots.

One of the American officers stated that in Charles W. Domville-Fife's book entitled "Submarine Engineering of Today" there is a chapter on "The Life of a Torpedo," which describes in understandable language and in a correct way these terrible missiles.

Torpedoes 14 to 19 Feet Long.

"A first-class battleship takes the best part of three years to build, and may cost anything from £1,000,000 upward," the author writes. "This ponderous ship of war can be sent to the bottom of the sea in but a few minutes if struck by a torpedo.

"The modern torpedo varies in length from fourteen to nineteen feet, and weighs up to half a ton. It has an extreme range of 4,000 yards. The blunt nose or 'war head,' as it is called, is the business end of the torpedo, and contains the dry and wet guncotton and the fulminate of mercury necessary for the explosion. Behind the explosive head is the air chamber to hold the compressed air by which motive power is furnished. Then we come to the search chamber or 'brain' of the weapon, which contains most marvelous mechanism for directing and controlling the machine. Next comes the engine room, and, at the tail of the torpedo, the buoyancy chamber.

"The moment a torpedo is used for practice a new phase of its life begins. Like a boy first going to school, a record is started of its conduct. It has already been given a distinctive number, and at the top of each record or 'history sheet,' as they are more often called, this will be entered. Below is entered the number of times it has been fired and any eccentricities which have been noticed during its progress through the water. It is a curious fact that no two torpedoes have ever been constructed exactly similar. Each one is always found to have some little peculiarities when traveling through the water. One will turn slightly to the left, another to the right, or sink in the water lower than is usual.

"Every one of these little peculiarities indulged in by the torpedo is noted in the history sheet and referred to before the weapon is again fired. By this means all the slight defects can be allowed for and a much more accurate aim obtained. It is the duty of the torpedo Lieutenant to make up all the 'history sheets' on a vessel, and he may be almost looked upon as a schoolmaster with a lot of small children to understand and manage. Sometimes, but not often during trials, a torpedo is lost. Perhaps days afterward the truant turns up, either washed ashore or towed in by some fishermen after having torn their nets to pieces.

Propulsion and Steering.

"A small chamber in the torpedo carries compressed air weighing about nine stone. This helps to sink it to the required depth after it has entered the water. This air, escaping from the chamber by means of a regulating valve, drives the engine at a high rate of speed, which is almost uniform throughout the trip from the tube to the target. The engines turn two screw propellers at the tail of the torpedo. These revolve on the same axis, but in opposite directions, the object being to give stability to the weapon—a necessary thing inasmuch as it has no keel and would rotate if it were driven by a single screw.

"The steering is effected by vertical rudders, which keep the torpedo in the required direction, while the proper depth in the water—usually from ten feet to fourteen feet—is maintained by horizontal rudders. The torpedo is kept submerged by means of the balance chamber, and is controlled in its steering by the wonderful instrument known as the gyroscope.

"So marvelous is its mechanism that in favorable circumstances a torpedo, well aimed, may be depended upon to strike within a yard or two of the spot aimed at. Briefly described, the gyroscope is a rotating wheel which automatically controls the torpedo's course.

"The method of firing a torpedo is very much like that of discharging a gun. It is expelled from a torpedo tube by compressed air. Upon reaching the water the torpedo is driven by its screws in the required direction. The missile is guided by a very ingenious invention called a 'torpedo director.' This is a little brass instrument fitted with 'sights' like a gun. When the sights are aligned on the enemy the officer in charge presses a key, and electricity causes the discharge.

Two Kinds of Tubes.

"Nearly every ship in the British Navy is fitted with tubes and carries Whitehead torpedoes. There are two kinds of tubes, above-water and submerged. The latter are much safer to work with, and have been found more effective, the above-water type being very liable to be struck just as a torpedo is being discharged."

The picture of the torpedo and the diagram and descriptions of the essential parts of a Whitehead torpedo are both taken from Domville-Fife's book on submarine engineering.

American submarine officers say that while the Whitehead type of torpedo embodies the principal feature of all torpedoes fired from submarine tubes, it is possible that the Germans may be using a torpedo that in certain minor particulars may differ from the Whitehead. So far as is positively known, however, the German torpedo is similar in practically all essentials to those used in other navies, and of which the Whitehead is the best known and most used type.

KRUPPS APPEALED TO EDISON.

Have Sought His Submarine Batteries for Four Years.

Special to The New York Times.

WEST ORANGE, N. J., May 9.—The German Government had made efforts for four years to obtain submarine storage batteries from Thomas A. Edison, according to Miller Reese Hutchison, chief engineer at the Edison Works here.

"Three times a year for four years a representative of the Krupp people, acting for the German Government, came to the United States to see what progress was being made with the submarine battery, having found the lead battery not entirely satisfactory," Mr. Hutchison said today. "Mr. Edison, however, would not sell a set of cells until he was satisfied they were perfect and would stand no improvement. This battery was not perfected until last September, or a month after the war started."

Asked what he thought of the sinking of the Lusitania, Mr. Hutchison, who is an authority on submarines, said:

"It seems strange that the Lusitania had no convoy of torpedo boats or cruiser or perhaps an aeroplane. There was a calm sea, and a submarine, although under water, could be seen in these circumstances. Of course, the submarine had already got the range of the Lusitania and it was a simple matter to send two torpedoes, one from her right bow tube, followed by a second from the tube behind."

INDIA IN BAD SHAPE, BRITISH OFFICER SAYS

Considers German Prisoners There Are Treated with Too Great Indulgence.

RUMORS OF MANY REVOLTS

Veterans and Civilians Barred from Service Form Independent Corps—Financial Management Bad.

A British officer writing from Rawal Pindi, in the Punjab, India, gives a sketchy, but enlightening account of present conditions in the empire. His letters, owing to the strict censorship, were brought out by a friend and reached this city yesterday. The officer, who is a Lieutenant in a regiment of Sikh Pioneers, writes under date of April 10, and his letter contains much criticism of the indulgent manner in which Germans were treated, even after the commencement of the war.

"Much money has been well spent by the German secret service," he writes, "and they have taken advantage of the opportunities given them by the slack and weak methods of the military and civic powers. Until a few weeks ago these German emissaries were allowed to be at large in Rangoon, Calcutta, Madras, Singapore, Colombo and many of the other greater cities of British India. When protests were made, it was calmly announced that they were not to be bothered because they were over the military age. As though that made them any less German, or any less likely to cause sedition and trouble!

"And now that all who appeared to be Germans have been made prisoners, they have been taken to the hills, because it was considered too hot for them down on the plains where most of us Englishmen have to stew. Of course, there is a chance that this is done so that they will be as far as possible from the centres where they might cause real trouble—that is, they are as far as possible from their former field of operation.

Policing of Camps Criticised.

"Then there is a lot of dissatisfaction over the way the prisoners' camps are being policed. Young men have been detailed to take care of them, and this is felt to be an injustice to the older men, who have been retired from Government service and yet are fit and able to do this work, and do it even better than the boys who are at it. They tell us that K. of K., (Lord Kitchener,) wants young men with him and under him, and that he wants young blood in the army. Why doesn't he draft these young fellows for active service and let the oldsters take their places? The old 'uns are game, and most have tried to get into the active service line again, but have been rejected on account of age. It seems a shame, too, when you think that they have served the Empire for twenty-five or thirty years and have a good many years' service left in them yet.

"In just the same way there is a lot of sore feeling over the low pay the volunteers get, while thousands of pounds are being squandered on the prisoners, who are being coddled at hill stations at a great expense to the Government, when they ought to be on short rations down on the plains.

"The public at home have no idea how rotten is the management of the Finance Department of India. The same lack of thoroughness that has crippled things at home is going to make bad trouble here. Things like this are happening every day. Good, active men want to join the volunteers, but are unable to get a definite promise of pay. Men over 46, who may be much younger through clean living in their prime, are refused for service at the front just because they are too old. And this refusal is made without any investigation, while hundreds of boys, callow youths, are taken from the banks and from behind counters and receive their £25 a month and allowances. And most of these only have their medical certificate to prove their fitness as officers of the Indian Army Reserve.

"It is true they are the right breed, and their hearts are in the right place, but lots of them are stoop-shouldered, bespectacled, gangling youths, and I wonder how many of them would have got by Kitchener or Lord Roberts—Bobs, bless him!—if he were looking them over.

Older Men Deeply Chagrined.

"The older and harder men of long service in India are bitter and heartbroken over being refused active work in the army. Then there is the Legion of Frontiersmen—men from 40 to 55, who have served the empire as such men only can—they are begging for work. There are 400 of them or more, and it seems criminal that they cannot be used. From their experience and fitness they would be splendid for base work at Nairobi or along the lines of communication in France or Belgium.

"Take France and Egypt today. There are gray-headed, sound men from all the colonies except India in both those places. Bobs knew better. At an inspection one day he said: 'Give me my old comrades, men with their twenty to thirty years' service; the soldier of 50, if the doctors pass him, is infinitely superior to the lad of 20.' Things would be different if he were with us today.

"Of course, you read of the Singapore shindy. That was a rotten business. As I write, the business is being cleaned up by the trial of four non-commissioned officers and forty-five Sepoys. When the row started, sixty Sepoys were shot or drowned, and six escaped to the jungle, but they are being hunted down. The Fifth Regiment ought to be disbanded and crossed off the army list for the disgrace it brought on the service. Three of the ringleaders were tried and shot in the public square, and a fourth received a sentence of banishment for fifteen years. The revolt was said to be about the method of promotion, but nobody believes that. Outside influences caused the trouble, and religion was the chief cause.

"Of course, you have heard of the Volunteer Corps? In all the big cities, like Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, and Singapore, all those who cannot enlist in the troops destined for the front, or who have been refused, have organized themselves into corps. These are on guard night and day and will prevent any possible trouble by stopping it before it begins. And they are a likely looking lot, too. Many of the older men, of which I spoke before, are with the corps and their intimate knowledge of India and its languages makes them invaluable in a case like this. And what is more, they will not shilly-shally and appeal to the great god of red tape—they will act, and action is what is needed now.

"The Little Englanders have been getting in their work. The pay of Indian officers leaving for the front has been cut, those who were on leave in England and who were sent to the fighting, and Sir Beauchamp Duff, the Commander in Chief, who is doing everything in his power to encourage recruiting, is handicapped by the fact that he can not get money to pay the new troops. There is a fight on between the India Government, the Home Government, and the Colonial Office, as to who shall pay the fourteen annas a day to the Calcutta Volunteer Gunners, and in the meantime the gunners go without.

"The Finance Department have shown themselves to be the most parsimonious and cheese-paring people on earth. Their present-day economy will result in our all getting our throats cut in the end. They make a horrible fuss of the shilling a day that belongs to the men who stand between us and the students and their ignorant followers in the cities, who are all rotten with treason and sedition. This is easily seen at Lahore and Bengal, where the walls of the railway stations and the railway trucks are scrawled with seditious writings. Furthermore, they have terrorized the Bengali magistrates and just need to send one of them a threatening letter and he will be afraid to act properly. When bomb cases come before them, they are in a blue funk.

Rumors of Revolts.

"India, which is the mother of rumors, is giving birth to an unwholesome crop now. The newspapers don't seem to dare to print the truth, and one hears terrible things. There are reports of revolts at many places, such as Peshawar, Allahabad, and Lahore, and it seems impossible to find out the truth. The censors are doing a very thorough job. In Calcutta, the Germans have spread all sorts of stories about our navy being wiped off the seas, and have preached liberty, license, and misrule until the natives think that England no longer exists and are expecting some sort of a heaven on earth under German rule. They, poor ignorant devils, think that the Turks and the Prophet will soon be governing India, and it makes it very tickly for us.

"The German women added their little bit to the seditious work that their men did. They used to go about the bazaars and chat with the natives and seem to be sorry that several more English battleships, the biggest and best, had been sunk. In fact, those busy women sunk the fleet several times over. Then they used to say that it was a shame that the English would soon lose India, and that the Germans would soon be landing, and all that sort of thing. This was very disquieting and bad for the natives, because they cannot distinguish between the English and German women and they would think that they were hearing our women deplore the things that were coming.

"Furthermore, until the end of March, and perhaps still, the Viceroy had a German bandmaster, and Lord Carmichael had one, too, and, what was worse, three days after war was declared, Lord Pentland, at Madras, gave a dinner to some of the leading Germans of that city!"

BEAT SUSPECTED "RIPPER."

Police Use Night Sticks to Save Pole from Angry Crowd.

A crowd of more than fifty men and boys in front of 523 West Fifty-second Street beat and kicked a man late last night in the belief that he was the "Jack the Ripper" sought for killing two children.

Patrolmen Charles Morris and Samuel Birney of the West Forty-seventh Street Police Station had to beat their way through the crowd with their night-sticks to rescue the man, and then had to fight with the crowd to guard the fallen man until help came in answer to the blasts of their whistles.

Two small boys started the trouble. They told persons in the street they had watched the man as he wandered about the street and peering into doorways. The suspected man disappeared into the hallway of 523 West Fifty-second Street. The report spread that he was the man wanted for the Leonora Cohn and Charlie Murray murders.

The patrolmen searched the house without finding the fugitive. Some one shouted:

"I saw him go over the roof."

The policemen went to the roof to be drawn to the street almost immediately by the angry shouts of men and boys.

Lying on the sidewalk while the crowd kicked him, they found a Pole. His face and head were bleeding profusely. He was taken to the police station, where he said he was Charles Kerey, a Pole, 42 years old, and a shoemaker, of 146 Seventeenth Street, Brooklyn. He said he used to have a shop in Tenth Avenue, and was visiting a friend on the top floor of 523 West Fifty-second Street. In his pocket was found a pair of bab's shoes, but he was too dazed to explain how he came to have them. He was detained in the station until detectives at work on the Ripper case could examine him.

MOB LYNCHES A WHITE MAN.

Overpower Oklahoma Jail to Get at Doctor Who Killed Wife.

Special to The New York Times.

NORMAN, Okla., May 9.—A mob composed of a dozen white men from Noble, eight miles south of Norman, took Dr. B. E. Ward, white, from the Cleveland County jail here early Sunday morning and hanged him to a tree two miles south of town. The physician stabbed his wife to death at their home in Noble while under the influence of liquor a week ago.

The mob, with one of its members handcuffed, knocked on the door of the county jail, and when the jailer put his head out of the window said they were officers and had a suspect whom they desired to place under arrest. When the jailer opened the door he was overpowered, his keys taken, and the mob seized Dr. Ward.

Dr. Ward was committed to the State asylum several years ago, but was released after one month on a writ of habeas corpus. He was expected to put in a plea of insanity at his trial for the murder.

Officers are investigating the lynching, but have no clues to the identity of members of the mob.

MRS. STONEBRAKER REWEDS

Follows Divorce by Becoming Mrs. F. A. Cornelius.

Special to The New York Times.

BALTIMORE, Md., May 9.—After facing an injunction by which her husband, Joseph R. Stonebraker, during divorce proceedings petitioned the court to forbid twelve named men from paying attention to her, Mrs. Constance Stillwell Stonebraker, formerly of this city, has been married to Frederick Alfred Cornelius of New York, according to word received here today. In a letter signed "Mrs. F. A. Cornelius" and written at the Continental Hotel, Newark, N. J., yesterday a request was made that the marriage be announced. It was stated that the couple would be at home after July 1 in Annapolis Court, Riverside Drive, New York.

Mr. Stonebraker is a Baltimorean. He obtained a divorce last March, with custody of the two children. Mrs. Cornelius is the daughter of William T. Stillwell, President of the Mapos Central Sugar Company, who has a residence in this city, but who is now said to be in California. Her first husband is a son of Mrs. J. R. Stonebraker, of Mount Washington.

CHOP WAY TO CHINESE.

Police Arrest Four Alleged Fantan Players in Mott Street Raid.

Choping their way through heavy double doors, Sergeant Mensching and four men of Inspector Wakefield's staff last night raided the room of a Chinese benevolent society at 41 Mott Street and found sixty Chinamen gathered for a purpose which, the police say, was the playing of the game of fantan.

When the policemen arrived, with drawn revolvers, the Chinese scattered, but four of them were caught and locked up in the Elizabeth Street station. A wagon load of chairs, an empty money box, and other appliances were carried away.

The certificate of incorporation of the society, which hung in a frame on the wall, was dated April 24.

REFUSED PAROLE, SET FREE

Convict Who Denied His Guilt Got Full Pardon.

TRENTON, N. J., May 9.—On July 8, 1904, John Budd, then about 50 years old, was received at the State prison from Hudson County, having been sentenced to serve fifteen years.

Budd, who had all along contended that he was innocent, was paroled in December, 1913, but he refused to leave the prison unless he received a full pardon. Two weeks ago the Board of Pardons met at the prison and considered Budd's appeal. The board investigated and yesterday granted the prisoner a full pardon. He had served ten years and eight months of his original sentence.

WICKERSHAM WOULD DISCIPLINE GERMANY

U. S. Should Lead in Movement to Preserve Civilization, He Insists.

DEMANDS 50 SUBMARINES

Ex-Attorney General's Program Would be to Protect Our Coasts at Once—Says Bryan is Unfit.

Upon the reply of the United States to the sinking of the Lusitania hangs the future position of the country among the nations of the world, declared ex-Attorney General George W. Wickersham last night. He followed up his letter to THE NEW YORK TIMES, published yesterday and demanding immediate action, with a stirring interview.

"The whole civilized world—and I take care to exclude Germany—looks to America to tell Germany where she stands as the avowed enemy of humanity and Christianity," he said. "If we do nothing, we give sanction to the most barbarous act the world's history—that is, the modern civilized world—ever saw. If we do nothing, we belie our position as in the vanguard of people in the march toward the highest plane of civilization. If we do nothing we will be to all the world as big a joke in all respects as Germany now thinks we are in military respects. From one ocean to another goes the question 'What is Washington going to do about it,' and with the question goes the determination that something must be done."

Stop writing letters to Ambassadors, call Congress in session immediately, and authorize the construction of fifty submarines at once and fifty more when they are under way is the first thing Mr. Wickersham thinks should be done as a prelude of the reply of this country to Germany's defiance of our diplomatic representations. The next thing to be done, Mr. Wickersham said, was for President Wilson to rid himself of the "fatuous policy of impracticable diplomacy" as carried out by Secretary of State Bryan and to call a conference of all the neutral powers of the world to discipline Germany. America must take the lead, he said, not only because of the special provocation of the death of 100 American citizens in the sinking of the Lusitania but because the leadership in the fight "to preserve civilization" belongs to this nation.

"We have been trailing along on the Bryan program of trusting to luck that nothing would happen and that we would not get into the war," said the ex-Attorney General. "It's a humiliation to this country that its diplomatic relations should be conducted by William Jennings Bryan. He doesn't know the first principles of what he is doing. Grape juice diplomacy! Lukewarm water diplomacy would be a better name.

Says We Are at a Crisis.

"We are at a crisis. let the people realize that according to Germany's construction of international law and rights in excusing the sinking of the Lusitania, there is nothing to prevent the Germans from excusing the sinking of the Philadelphia at the same spot the Lusitania was sent to the bottom. They have declared, they say, a blockade about England. Could they not claim that when the Philadelphia or any other ship, flying the American flag or not, passed through the English Channel, she was running the blockade? This shows that something has to be done and done quickly.

"Germany has shown that she is amenable to no argument save the argument of force. That makes the program clearer. Germany plays with the United States because she thinks we are so weak that she could send a few cruisers over here and terrorize the Atlantic seaboard. If any one doubt this let him read the writings of Bernhardt issued just before the beginning of the war. Germany is not careful of our rights because she thinks she is not in danger from us and that she cannot frighten us into 'starting anything' with her.

"In this situation an ample fleet of submarines to protect both the Atlantic and Pacific Coast would put us in a position to be a little firm in what we have to say to Germany or to any other power who imposes upon us. We have about eight submarines now that are modern. We should have twenty times as many.

"The President should call Congress together at once, and fifty submarines should be laid immediately and fifty more very soon. Now is the accepted time. We have allowed six months and more to elapse and done nothing to remedy our almost helpless condition. I doubt seriously whether Mr. Wilson has the backbone to overrule Bryan and call Congress for this and other urgent purposes, but I urge that he will curb the gentleman from Nebraska for the good of himself, his party, and the nation. It is to be hoped that the aroused public sentiment for action will make Mr. Bryan see that action will win some votes for him.

"With submarines enough to protect our coast we would be in a position where Germany could not harm us. Would that not put us in a place to deal with impositions and insults?

"Another thing that it is suicidal to neglect is the replenishing of the supply of ammunition for our navy. If necessary the Government should start plants of its own to make our ships ready to go to battle if the time comes. What can Mr. Daniels and Mr. Bryan say to the circumstance that the great fleet now in the Hudson River is not one-third equipped with ammunition? Is that the proper condition when our condition might be that of a warring nation in a week or so?

Might Seize German Ships.

"I am not preaching war. I think a parliament of all neutral nations could agree to cut off all aid and supplies from Germany and impose upon her a loss greater than she would suffer by an immediate declaration of war by the United States. Germany is getting supplies from outside, no matter what her diplomatic representatives may say. She is getting the mthrough many nations, although it isn't in the newspapers.

"But, if war were to come, let it not be supposed that this nation could do no more than 'make faces at Germany' as one Berlin paper puts it. For one thing we could seize all the German ships in American harbors. That would give us a first-class merchant marine. We could do more to help the Allies than we are doing. This is outside of our actual participation in hostilities.

"No matter what we do, we must get ready or we can do nothing. There is a great lack of small arms in this country."

"Do you think Washington should prohibit the shipping of arms and ammunition to the warring nations?" was asked.

"By no means," was the reply. "The Allies are getting most of what is being shipped, and the Allies are fighting our battle—by that I mean the battle of civilization.

"I think Congress should provide immediately for more recruits. I think General Wood's suggestion of one-year service should be adopted and that our army should be raised to 100,000 men. This would give 100,000 citizens a year's training. Then we need more officers. I would triple the facilities for training officers; let them stay two years in training, give them a year's pay in advance, and send them back to civilian life. In this way there would be a great reserve to draw upon—a reserve of trained officers and men."

Dorothy Donnelly Again in 'Candida'

Arnold Daly will round out his season of revivals of Shaw comedies with four performances of "Candida" in the Park Theatre. For these performances, which will be given the afternoons of May 18, 20, 25 and 27, Dorothy Donnelly has been engaged for her original rôle of Candida. Mr. Daly's engagement will continue three more weeks and it is probable after that he will not be seen here again as an interpreter of Bernard Shaw. It was with Miss Donnelly in "Candida" that the actor scored his first great Shaw success.

SEEK GARZA'S LIFE IN MEXICO CITY

Outbreak in Capital Ends in Attempt to Assassinate the Provisional President.

BARONA'S TROOPS ATTACK

Severe Fighting with Zapatistas Ends in Their Reported Repulse.

GEN. ESTRADA IS SLAIN

Killed by Barona in Personal Quarrel—Fifty Fall in the Later Fighting.

WASHINGTON, May 9.—An attempt to assassinate General Roque Gonzales Garze, the Convention Provincial President of Mexico, was made today by troops led by General Barona, former military commander of Mexico City, according to dispatches reaching here tonight from the Mexican capital.

Barona's troops were repulsed after severe fighting, with losses on both sides.

A critical situation is said to exist within the capital as a result of a rupture between General Zapata and General Garza, and tonight's dispatches said "grave events" were feared. General Zapata, it was said, has sent a telegram to the convention demanding that General Palafox, who was put out of the Cabinet by Garza, be immediately restored to office.

General Zapata's forces dominate the territory south of Mexico City and are believed to be able to control the capital itself, as General Villa, with the main army of the Convention Government, is operating further north against General Obregon, who is between him and the capital. Tonight's dispatches gave the first information, except through reports from Carranza sources, of the break between Zapata and Garza.

Reports from the War Department in Mexico City are said to state that General Barona was arrested, but there are rumors that he escaped wounded. His brother, General Zapatelas, was reported to have been killed.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MEXICO CITY, May 7, (Delayed in Transmission.)—General Francisco Estrada, Chief of Staff of General Roque Gonzales Garza, the Provisional President, was killed in this city this morning by General Antonio Barona, a Zapata chieftain who has been operating in the South. The killing occurred in a dance hall during a drunken brawl.

Both Barona and Estrada had many adherents with them, and all quickly became involved in the fight. Barona first stabbed Estrada in the abdomen and then shot him, killing him.

The general fighting then shifted from the dance hall to the Hotel Lascurain, where Barona came face to face with General Juan Banderas, another Zapata chieftain, and for a long time his bitter enemy. Banderas also had some of his followers along, and the fighting in and outside of the Hotel Lascurain became a pitched battle. In the Hotel Lascurain fighting more than fifty men were killed.

General Garza late this afternoon issued an official statement regarding the fight, in which he said that there was no ground to believe that any serious division existed in the ranks of the faction now in control in Mexico City. He said that the fight was due to the intoxication of Barona, who resisted the efforts of the police to quiet him.

"There is no occasion for alarm," said General Garza, "and the authorities have the situation well in hand. There will be no further fighting, and those responsible for the outbreak will be properly dealt with. There is no truth in the report that Barona's attack was directed against me."

Garza makes his home in the Hotel Lascurain.

MEXICO CITY, Mexico, May 8, (delayed in transmission.)—Manuel Sierra Mendez, who figured socially in past régimes, has been arrested. He is in the penitentiary.

READY TO REPORT ON MEXICO.

But West Finds the President Too Busy to See Him.

WASHINGTON, May 9.—Duval West, former United States District Attorney at San Antonio, Texas, who has been in Mexico for three months as the personal representative of President Wilson, interviewing the principal leaders and generals, returned here today to report in person the results of his investigation.

M. West found Government officials so thoroughly absorbed in the situation produced by the Lusitania disaster that he decided to wait until tomorrow before arranging for conferences.

When he arrived at his hotel here he found a letter from an intimate friends, Dr. F. S. Pearson, written the day before the Lusitania sailed. Pearson was one of those lost in the disaster.

It is not believed the President will be able to discuss Mexican affairs for several days—until he has shaped the policy of the Government in the European situation.

Mr. West has made no telegraphic or mail reports since he started. Keeping the State Department informed merely of his movements.

He interviewed Generals Villa and Angeles, first and met several of their subordinate officacl. Then he went to Vera Cruz and talked with General Carranza and his Cabinet. Later he visited General Zapata and surveyed the situation in Mexico City.

PRICES PINCH VERA CRUZ.

Merchants Denounced as Exorbitant at Public Meeting.

VERA CRUZ, May 9.—Protests against the high cost of living were made at a meeting attended today by more than 800 men.

Speakers denounced the attitude of Spanish merchants in raising prices, asserting that they were taking advantage of the country's situation to make exorbitant profits.

RESENTENCE FRANK TODAY.

Plea to Court May Be Made by Man Convicted as Girl's Slayer.

Special to The New York Times.

ATLANTA, Ga., May 9.—Leo M. Frank will be brought into Judge Ben Hill's courtroom tomorrow morning to be resentenced for the fourth time to the scaffold for the murder of Mary Phagan.

Judge Hill, as soon as he goes upon the bench, will grant the habeas corpus writ commanding Sheriff Mangum to produce Frank in the courtroom. Neither Frank nor his attorneys would state tonight whether or not he would address the court at the time of his sentence. It is reported, however, that Frank has prepared a plea which he intends to deliver before sentence is passed. Upon the occasion of his last resentencing he made an address to Judge Hill, in which he predicted that truth would eventually prevail, exonerating him, and in which he also branded his conviction a supreme injustice.

The exact hour of Frank's appearance in court will be kept secret in order to prevent the gathering of a great crowd. As soon as he has been resentenced his attorneys will begin to push the petition for commutation of the death sentence to life imprisonment, which has already been filed with the Prison Commission.

Jim Conley, the negro whose story told so heavily against Frank, and who is serving twelve months' sentence as accessory after the fact to the murder of Mary Phagan, will be freed about the date fixed for Frank's death.

Detectives Lehon, Tedder, Rogers, and Whitfield, who would have worked on the Frank case for W. J. Burns, are to be tried this week for alleged misdemeanor in connection with their investigations.

The trial of the Rev. C. B. Ragsdale and R. L. Barber, who accused Lehon, Tedder, and Arithur Thurman of bribery in the making of alleged false affidavits for the Frank defense, is also set for this week.

The three Burns men were acquitted sometime ago. Ragsdale and Barber are charged with perjury. Ragsdale swore to an affidavit that he overheard two negroes talking and that one of them confessed that he slew Mary Mary Phagan. Barber made an affidavit corroborating Ragsdale and declaring this negro to have been Jim Conley, the accuser of Leo Frank. Ragsdale and Barber retracted these affidavits and swore they were bribed to make them.

WOULDN'T WED DIVORCEE.

New York Couple Try in Vain to Marry in Hackensack.

Special to The New York Times.

HACKENSACK, May 9.—Clark L. Jordan, Jr., of 50 Rutland Road, Brooklyn, and Mrs. Nell J. Beaver of St. Nicholas Avenue, New York, came here yesterday in an automobile and obtained a license to be married from Register E. M. Johnson. They then telephoned to the Rev. A. Peter Pulp of Christ Episcopal Church and asked him to marry them. The Rev. Mr. Pulp asked if either had been divorced, and Mrs. Beaver said that she had been. The minister then refused to perform the ceremony.

The couple then asked G. H. Maidment, a lawyer of Hackensack, to find a minister to marry them. Several prominent ministers here yesterday denied that they had married the couple.

AVIATOR FALLS 200 FEET.

Munford Injured Seriously While Testing a Monoplane.

Special to The New York Times.

TRENTON, N. J., May 9.—Carl Munford, a San Francisco aviator who had made many flights over Hempsted Plains, in Long Island, was brought here today from Allentown, five miles away, where he was seriously injured in a fall yesterday.

He was testing a new monoplane which he intended to use in a flight to Atlantic City, when an accident occurred and the monoplane dropped 200 feet to the ground. He was treated by a physician, but his condition became worse, and today he was taken to St. Francis Hospital here. His right arm is broken, there are many cuts and bruises about the head and body, and internal injuries are feared.

SAVE 47 HORSES FROM FIRE.

Police Drive Frightened Animals from Third Floor of Burning Stable.

The promptness of aPtrolmen Beck and Henny of the East Twenty-second Street Station, aided by persons in the street, resulted in the rescue last night of forty-seven horses when fire started in the three-story stables and workshop of the New England Pie Baking Company and the Knickerbocker Biscuit Company at 642 and 644 East Sixteenth Street, near Avenue, C. The fire was discovered by Beck, who, after turning in an alarm, went into the building with others and found the horses tied on the third floor, with blazing embers from the burning building above them dropping down and in one or two cases setting fire to the manes. There was no time to untie them, so those of the rescuers who had knives cut the ropes that hitched the horses and the patrolmen by striking them smartly under the chin with night sticks drove them down the runway to safety.

Battalion Chief Skelly turned in a second alarm soon after he arrived, and Acting Chief Smoky Joe Martin took charge of operations. The blaze broke through the roof, and a light wind drove the embers over toward Avenue C, on the other side of which was a large gas tank. An engine company was detailed to protect this. The main building the two concerns is directly back of the stables at 629-35 East Fifteenth Street, but the buildings were separated by a wide courtyard, where wagons were parked, and the firemen confined the blaze to the stables. The loss was estimated at $10,000.

ROW ON HIPPODROME STAGE

Singer Breaks Director E. P. Temple's Nose.

Edward P. Temple, Stage Director of the Hippodrome, suffered a broken nose yesterday afternoon in a fight on the rear of the Hippodrome stage with Vernon Dalhart, a singer. Dalhart was substituting for Richard Neeley, the boy soprano, whose performances at the Hippodrome were stopped on Saturday by the Gerry Society because of his youth. Dalhart was singing some of the songs heard at the Hippodrome in former years.

As Dalhart left the stage at the end of the act, Stage Director Temple began to discuss his singing. Blows followed. Before the two were parted, Temple had suffered severely. Dalhart, who sang again in the evening, showed no signs of ill usage.

MOTHERS' DAY EVEN IN JAIL.

White Carnations Given to Prisoners in Hackensack.

Thousands of persons in New Jersey yesterday wore the white carnation, "the flower of memory," in observance of Mothers' Day. One of the features of the celebration was the presentation of carnations to all the prisoners in the Hackensack jail by the women members of a church, and Mrs. C. Chapman of Englewood brought in writing materials and persuaded all those prisoners who had mothers to write to them.

An effort was made to have Governor Fielder issue a proclamation definitely establishing the day, but he said that if he issued such proclamations whenever requested to they would lose force from their frequency. He expressed himself, however, as entirely in sympathy with the movement.

HOW WAR SURGEONS LOCATE BULLETS

Mark the Spot with a Piece of Wire Until They Are Ready to Operate.

DEMONSTRATED AT JUILLY

American Branch Hospital There Also Treats Gas Gangrene Successfully.

Dr. Benjamin Jablons of this city, who is one of the assistants of Dr. Joseph A. Blake in France, contributes to the current issue of The New York Medical Journal an account of a visit to the American Branch Hospital at Juilly, which he describes as the most comfortable military reserve hospital in France.

Among other things he tells of a successful method of treating gas gangrene, hitherto an extremely fatal disease, as well as an ingenious method of locating foreign bodies, such as bullets and fragments of shrapnel, in the wounded.

"Owing to the kindness of Dr. Blake," he writes, "an opportunity to see the new Branch Hospital at Juilly was given me. Professor Dastre, President of the Société de Biologie, and Dr. Weimberg were the other members of the party. The presence of several cases of gas gangrene at the new hospital and the occasion they afforded for a demonstration of the efficacy of the new serum prepared by Dr. Weimberg was the raison d'être of the trip.

"The hospital at Juilly is a sixteenth century building, used for a long time as a Roman Catholic seminary, but even before the war it had been particularly condemned owing to its inadequacy for educational purposes. Mrs. Whitney's offer came at a time when very few buildings which were suitable had not already been converted into reserve hospitals. This was the only one available. It was taken possession of by the American contingent, of which Dr. Martin was in charge, and in less than two months' time had been transformed into what I can definitely say is the most comfortable reserve military hospital in France. Needless to say that the task was a very costly one.

"The building, erected when France was at the height of her glory, had been intended to withstand a siege, if necessary, and it was quite an undertaking to install modern plumbing and modern heating appliances. This was finally accomplished, however, and today the hospital is in a position to take care of 250 wounded soldiers, and as well as possible. The comforts of the Lycée Pasteur are not to be had at Juilly, but naturally a twentieth century building and a sixteenth century one are not to be compared, and American ingenuity and American money have made possible twentieth century medical measures in the latter as well as in the former—a feat to be proud of.

"The American contingent there today consists of Dr. Lyall, Dr. Sutton, Dr. Hervey, Dr. Clarke, and Dr. Mixter. Dr. Lyall, visiting surgeon at Roosevelt and St. Luke's hospitals, is in full charge of the hospital at Juilly. Extreme antiquity is the predominant note of the place, but its godliness is accentuated by its extreme cleanliness. It could not have been an easy task to convert the large rooms into wards, and still more difficult to install the X-ray outfit, the pharmacy, and the laboratory. The laboratory is sufficiently complete for all clinical methods of research. The pharmacy is also used as an out-patient department for the indigent members of the village community.

"In the wards the same type of patient as at the Lycée Pasteur was to be seen. One patient had had a badly compounded fracture of the right femur, and was being treated with the Steinmann splint. The splint had been inserted through the condyles of the femur with a traction of twleve pounds. The fragments of the femur, despite four weeks with no attempt at replacement, were in perfect apposition.

Treating Gas Gangrene.

"Several cases of gas gangrene infection had been treated by multiple incisions, followed by washing out with peroxide of hydrogen and almost immediate exposure to the sun. This form of therapy is of easy access at Juilly, where the sun is particularly intense for a number of hours of the day. The wounds had healed with rapidity. One case had very extensive scarring, with no limitation of motion, however.

"Another case, in which the infection had complicated a very extensive wound of the thigh, had been treated in similar fashion. The large granulating wound had had several skin grafts inserted. Some of these had been removed from the opposite limb and had taken beautifully; a few small strips of heterogeneous skin (that is, taken from another soldier who had volunteered,) had not taken so well and could with facility be distinguished by its pale, anaemic look. Judy O'Grady and the Colonel's Lady are not always sisters under their skins.

"Dr. Sutton demonstrated to the assembled savants an ingenious method for localization of foreign bodies. This method, originally suggested by an English surgeon for the removal of bullets from the brain, was applied to foreign bodies situated in other parts of the body. The instruments consisted of a trocar and cannula, which were inserted under the radioscopic screen until the point of the trocar came into contact with the projectile. A small bit of piano wire was then introduced, slightly curved at its extremity, the wire kept in place and the trocar removed. The wire was then cut off close to the surface of the skin, a dressing applied, and later, when the part affected was operated on, served as an excellent guide to the position of the bullet; a very ingenious method for what is at times a very difficult operation.

"Dr. Lyall demonstrated a simple apparatus which permitted the use of less traction on a fractured limb. Its essential principle was based on the fact that it needed only one-third of the traction to keep in place a fractured limb when flexed that it took to immobilize the same limb in the extended position. This has been adopted at the larger ambulance in Neuilly with satisfactory results.

"After an extended visit over the building and an inspection of the grounds (not a very delightful task, owing to the 'vilain temps' it was our misfortune to encounter) the party set off for the battlefield of the Marne, only a stone's throw from the ambulance. It is a wise general who paves the way for retreat when victory is in sight. The French have developed wise generals. Despite the fact that the German troops are held at a very safe distance from the former battlefield of the Marne, the French general staff has not neglected to take proper precautions. Trenches, practical as well as comfortable, have replaced the former hastily constructed grooves.

"The ground, however, showed no signs of the terrific struggles which had taken place. The products of the earth apparently needed no better nourishment than human blood, for nothing could look more fertile than the fields we passed by. The villages that we encountered had a much less peaceful look. On each side were houses showing evidences of the terrible fire to which they had been exposed. In many of them were new bits of roofing mingled with old shingles that had done duty for many a generation. Holes in the walls produced by shrapnel had been hastily patched without, however, obliterating the scars.

"The church is evidently always a second thought, for while the houses had practically all been put back into a state of usefulness, the church remained as an everlasting monument to humanity's backsliding. The steeple was represented by a few bits of stone. The walls of the church looked like some ancient ruin. The entrance to the interior was blocked by a huge mass of débris and a large bronze bell. The disfigured picture of some sacred scene was all that was left of the altar. The nave was likewise a litter of stones and dirt. In the lust of war nothing is holy, except cannon and other engines of destruction.

A War Cemetery.

"Behind the church, a short distance from the village, is a rough monument that has hastily been put up to those who fell in the battle of the Ourcq in the early days of September, where two regiments of tirailleurs had been completely annihilated. This monument and the few roughly constructed crosses were all that remained to remind the world that the brave tirailleurs had once lived. Further on the ground was strewn with crosses. What had been a battlefield now looked like a boundless cemetery, in which the hopes of Germany had been buried as well as the hopes of many a sorrowing mother of France.

"Occasionally a more pretentious cross was to be seen, surrounded, perhaps, by a wreath of flowers, with some inscription—Mort pour la patrie. Close by, a cemetery was visible which had been the scene of a terrific action, now forming the last resting place of many a tirailleur. A few Germans likewise had been buried there. The name of Schmidt seemed a bit incongruous, but surely these men were nearer in death than they had ever been in life.

"We retraced our steps, stopping now and then to see some serpentine line of trenches. Modern warfare has converted man into a burrowing animal. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that the infections of this war are the infections produced by the baciliary inhab itants of the earth. On every side were graves, each bearing testimony to the awful effects of high-power projectiles on men engaged in trench warfare. How much more progress there is still to be made to enable us to fight our natural enemies as well as we fight our enemies of choice, the mortality of the past few months has sufficiently demonstrated."

TWO HOURS OF BIG FUN.

Yearling Black Bear Loose in Boston Animal Store.

A year-old black bear of the Maine woods variety forced open the door of his wire cage in the store of the Park & Pollard Company, at Canal and Market Streets, yesterday afternoon about 1, and for two hours went on the liveliest rampage in the long storehouse of animals that it has ever been the lot of a private menagerie to witness.

The little black Bruin, who goes by the name of Pop, has been rather disconsolate in his cage ever since his running mate was sold a few weeks ago. This mood took the form of restlessness yesterday afternoon, and ended in a fit of snappishness that made him as dangerous as a live wire.

Investigations into the habits and habitats of the other odd thousand residents proved rather costly to the proprietors of the establishment, although Pop was put back into his cage before he had done any irreparable damage. Two "keepers," a patrolman from Station 1, and a newspaper man (not Joe Knowles,) finally succeeded in cornering the brute and noosing him to safety and his usual place of captivity.

But in that two hours Pop had wandered up and down the store, which is a block long; had bitten off the end of a bag of corn and swallowed the contents, had unselfishly released a tribe of rabbits from their pens by breaking down their wire cage, had made an attack upon a moose head nailedt o a board, had crawled in and out of numerous bins, had set the birds screeching and chattering, and had afforded amusement to a crowd of several hundred persons who surrounded the windows of the store on the Friend Street side.

The crowd about the store gave the first indication that anything was wrong. Then some one called Police Headquarters, and Policeman Malcolm Blue of the Hanover Street Station was dispatched to the scene with a pitchfork. A rake was at first suggested, but was discarded in favor of the pointed instrument.

Before the brave men entered the store to cage the beast, Bruin had had the time of his life, to the delight of the crowd outside. He began by investigating the fancy food sthred in the bins and took a taste of oyster shells, whole wheat, yellow medicated nest egg producer, cut alfalfa, meat scraps, puppy food, unshelled rice, canary seed, dog biscuit and other delicacies. But a sniff of these was sufficient, for he found several sacks of yellow corn and pounced upon them with glee.

"The old food and the wholesome food," says Pop.

Several times the crowd outside could hear him squeal as he crawled into a bin and hurt himself in getting out again. Then dogs began to bark, canary birds set up a twittering, monkeys began bander-log chatter, peacocks shrieked, rabbits ran hither and thither, and bedlam was let loose. The fish alone in their tanks were silent. But now and then as one flopped to the surface, it was evident that even the dwellers in the water were not oblivious to the confusion. The chickens ran about squawking whenever the mass of black fur brushed against the pens, but Pop didn't get a taste of blood, and for that reason did not make the trouble he might have.

The chase came to an end when Edward O. Braxton, the floor manager of the store, made a noose out of a long animal whip and induced Pop to descend from the top of a tall poultry cage on which he had taken refuge on the Friend Street side. Pop went up the side of the cage with ease and roamed about the top snapping at his pursuers, but was afraid to jump down with two patrolmen, several men with cameras and the keepers below him.

Boxes were piled up which at last made the descent easy. And as Pop was coaxed back to his cage and put behind the bars by Braxton and his brother, A. R. Braxton, a patrolman pointed to a sign that hung near the bear's cage and asked what it meant.

"That's Italian," said one of the men who worked in the store. "It says 'Pollame Vive per mangiare, sivendono a basso,' and that means 'Live poultry for sale downstairs.'"

"Who taught the bear to read Italian?" asked the officer. — Boston Herald.

Pastor in One Church 45 Years.

TARRYTOWN, N. Y., May 9.—The Rev. John Knox Allen today celebrated his forty-fifth anniversary as pastor of the First Reformed Church and the Old Dutch Church at Sleepy Hollow. The subject of his sermon was "The Old Paths." Dr. Allen has only had two charges. His first was at Hoboken, N. J., where he spent two years.

AUSTRALIA RUFFLED, BUT STILL FRIENDLY

Found Our Neutrality Hard to Understand at First, but Now Appreciates It Better.

'ANTI-AMERICAN' TALK THIN

Partly Caused by Garbled Statements and Partly by Nationalist and High Tariff Sentiments.

Special Correspondence of THE NEW YORK TIMES.

SYDNEY, Australia, April 10.—Scattered disparagement here of President Wilson and his Administration and to a less extent dispraise of the American people because of the Government's course since the European war began led apparently to distorted ideas in the United States as to Australian public opinion on the subject of America's position toward the combatants. The criticisms are happily declining, and it should be understood that the aspersions were never more rigorous than that which characterizes a hot political campaign in the United States.

The reports printed in "the States" about what Australians think of them are essentially false if they have not pointed out that whatever asperities there have been, Americans in Australasia, whose number runs into four or five figures, have been treated constantly in a cousinly fashion. Unkind things have been said of the President by some periodicals, and earlier, before the true feeling of the people of the United States was gauged, they came in for condemnation as being "commercialized" and "dollarized," but comparatively little of this editorial opinion has been translated into business or other intercourse.

There has been but one outbreak by a public man against America and all the signs point to this gentleman's being in a decided minority. The rest of the "anti-Americanism" may be summed up in a few newspaper leaders' articles and pictures.

It is one of the unfortunate features of cabled news items, even in normal times, that while frequently saying much they frequently say too little, which is the probable reason for the stir caused among Australians by a Washington dispatch via London which stated that in sending birthday greetings to the German Emperor, President Wilson "wished" that monarch "good luck." This dispatch, which looked odd upon the face of it and was a paraphrase of formal words, made the Australian gorge rise, and incited Representative Watt of Victoria to say at a public luncheon in Melbourne that Mr. Wilson's act was a "wanton, profligate outrage," and to add:

"We have about become tired of this anaemic feminized closet philosopher who presides over this otherwise great nation and who at the same time is fishing on both sides of the Atlantic for notoriety and for dollars."

But there have been no public echoes of this speech, which was founded upon the newspaper dispatch alone. The United States may be accused by Australians—as it was during the controversy between the Washington and London Governments over contraband and the German "paper blockade"—of not "playing the game," but the more thoughtful of them know that the President is moved by considerations which are personally of the highest.

Our Position Now Understood.

Ever since the war began the currents of feeling in the United States respecting the war have been closely followed. Extracts from leading American newspapers appear in Australian newspapers almost daily; travelers returning from the other side of the Pacific are questioned particularly upon this point, and when, as is invariably the case, the interviews reflect the preponderating sympathy with the Allies which prevails under the Stars and Stripes, they receive a conspicuous place in the columns. American magazines with their many articles dealing with the struggle are conned, and altogether the dominant view in America, making allowances for the meagre cablegrams from Washington and New York, which doubtless have had to run the gauntlet of the British censorship, is now well understood and fairly well appreciated.

The attacks in print upon the President and his country have been inspired chiefly by jealousy and by the "higher tariff" element, which is strongest in Victoria. Of the first motive it should be said that a certain class of Australians resent the evident but indefinable influence which the United States has upon the life and the outlook of the Commonwealth. Quite naturally this "Americanization" meets with disfavor among a section of this young, sensitive, and impressionable people, regardless of the fact that Australia owes a great deal to "Americanization," and in years to come will owe more.

The spirit of nationality, which is strongly growing here and has not the modifying factor of contiguity in the sense that Canada has, must find expression somehow, especially at a time like this. Therefore, since Japan and the Japanese cannot for diplomatic causes be any longer a butt for Australian prejudice, occasional whacks are dealt the United States of America.

As for higher protection, which is one of the aims of the Labor Party, and will soon be converted into action that will be felt in the United States, the cry for it is loudest in the columns of the weekly laborite organ, the Sydney Bulletin, whose motto is "Australia for the Australians," and in those of the Melbourne Argus. This "high protection" agitation is due to a belief, which is far from being shared by all Australians, that the time has come for the Commonwealth to foster "infant industries" by stiffer duties, and make larger use of its wealth of raw material.

Combined with these things is the present pressing business of helping to down Germany and aid of Great Britain. This has an effect upon the United States, for it is no longer possible for American firms to obtain federal contracts in Australia. The same is not altogether true of State and municipal contracts, but the spirit of "Help the Allies" and "Trade within the Empire" is abroad in the land. The first sentiment incidentally is accountable for the once commonly displayed American flag being conspicuous nowadays by its absence in Australian cities.

It is somewhat disconcerting to Americans also to have Australian merchants ask, "Where is that made?" and, when told, say, "I won't buy it if it is made in America." Yet so strong is the hold that thousands of American products have upon Australian consumers that cases of this kind are exceptions rather than the rule.

Neutrality Irritates.

Yet when all this is said the fact remains that the bonds of amity between Australians and Americans are as strong as ever. The neutrality which the United States has chosen to observe may be irritating, and in the light of what Australians with other Britons are wont to regard as England's partiality toward the United States before and during the Spanish war it may be disappointing; but neither irritation nor disappointment can nullify the geographical relation of the Republic to Australia as the latter's nearest Caucasian neighbor. The visit of the "White Squadron" in 1908 has not been forgotten, although Australia now has a creditable navy of her own.

American dollars are not despised, either, as was seen a few weeks ago when the American demand raised the Australian wool market from the "slough of despond" and started a boom after arrangements had been made to prevent any of the staple reaching German hands.

The war precludes any opportunity of forming a just judgment respecting the good the Panama Canal will do Australia, but it is significant that a Government movement is on foot looking to a direct steamer service between the Commonwealth and the Eastern ports of the United States. Moreover, the largest shipments of wool to the United States in the history of the Australian trade are now being made via Panama.

Then there is the Panama-Pacific Exposition; there is the big Australian-California trade, which is fast increasing; and there is the hope which one encounters everywhere in the Commonwealth that once peace is restored, American settlers may be induced to flock to the Commonwealth as they have to Canada.

It is not for naught that the States of New South Wales, Victoria, and Queensland set up an Australian pavilion at the San Francisco fair and have on exhibition what they think will appeal most to the practical American mind. Mr. Deakin, the Commonwealth's special representative, is not in San Francisco merely for the sake of amenities, but he is there to foster American immigration and the flow of American capital Australiawards.

No digs by newspapers, no manufactured anti-American letters, and no garbled statements can gainsay these and other evidences of good-will. When the war is a thing of the past no one who is acquainted with the temper of the Australian people can doubt that "Old Glory" will recover its place among them. The kind sentiments expressed recently at functions given by Australians to departing Consular representatives of the United States, Messrs. Bray of Sydney and Killmaster of Newcastle, give full proof of this.

A GLIMPSE OF 1930.

Some Things We Shall Have for Entertaining Our Callers.

"So glad to see you, Mr. Beesley. Won't you come a little closer to the thermal plates? Rather chilly, this evening, isn't it? Take the automatic oscillator."

"Thank you, Miss Breeze. It is a little less caloricky than yesterday."

Here follows the usual dull interval.

"I came across an odd book in the attic the other day, Mr. Beesley. It is called a photograph album. It is filled with photographs taken before the day of films and reels—all portraits of my respected ancestors, such a dear old bunch of frights. They used to entertain callers with these family albums. Think of that.

"And that reminds me—I want you to hear some new discs we've had made for the family dictaphone. I think they're very good. Have you got the audipads adjusted? Then here goes. This is Aunt Jane nagging Uncle John at 2 A. M. Good, isn't it? This is Brother Willie flirting on the front porch with the girl next door. Do you get the giggles? This is ma showing pa a dressmaker's bill. Some of it is censored. Awf'ly funny, don't you think? Here is Mr. Slimmer proposing to Sister Laura. She's going to use this before the Breach of Promise Commission. Did you ever hear anything so mushy? Oh, must you go? Come again soon. Goo' night."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

SPERRY'S PLANE IS UPSET.

Young Inventor of Stabilizer Meets with Mishap on Bedloe's Island.

Engine trouble caused Lawrence R. Sperry, who, with his father, Elmer C. Sperry, of Brooklyn, invented the Sperry gyroscopic aeroplane stabilizer, to beach a hydroplane, with which he was making tests for the Government at Bedloe's Island yesterday, and it was reported that a gust of wind upset the hydroplane soon after he had landed.

Mr. Sperry telephoned to his home at 100 Marlboro Road, in Flatbush, early yesterday afternoon that there had been no serious mishap and that he intended to sail back to the Brooklyn Navy Yard in the hydroplane early in the evening. It was later determined, however, to leave the machine at the island over night. Accompanying Mr. Sperry was a naval aviator.

Close Jewish Charity Fund.

Although complete returns will not be in for several days, the managers of the campaign of the Brooklyn Federation of Jewish Charities to raise $100,000, which ended last night, believe that they succeeded in reaching the mark set. The big fair held in the Twenty-third Regiment Armory, which closed on Saturday night, was very profitable. The campaign closed with a vaudeville performance at the Lyric Theatre, Manhattan, under the direction of Sylvan Levy, President of the Unity Club of Brooklyn.

SAYS FRANCE MUST BE WELL WHIPPED

Too Much Sympathy for Her in Germany, the Frankfurter Zeitung Declares.

FINDS SOCIALISTS LOYAL

Those Proposing Peace Terms a Small Minority—Quotes Hervé's French Paper Against Them.

A protest against too much sympathy in Germany toward France is made in the Frankfurter Zeitung of April 13, which devotes a long editorial to the task of showing that France must be "whipped so hard that she will lose all desire for extending her hand toward the Rhine."

The paper tells of a recent manifesto sent by a few German Socialists, who did not sign their names, into the countries now at war with Germany, declaring that they would labor to cooperate with the Socialists of those countries for a peace that should include no annexations, but political and economic independence of all nations, general disarmament, and compulsory arbitration. To this appeal, "sent out behind the back of the Social Democratic Party of Germany," according to the Frankfurter Zeitung, the French Socialist Hervé issued the following rather disconcerting reply in his paper, the Guerre Sociale:

"Let me tell you why I will not help you, my dear Liebknecht, and why I hope that no French Socialist will approve of your appeal, at least, not now. To say it in a word, we do not want to help your Kaiser and your cabbage-headed Junkers to escape the stream of blood in which they are about to drown. For what you ask is no more nor less than immunity from punishment for the throttling of Serbia and the violation of Belgium's neutrality, and for the unchaining of the most terrible catastrophe in Europe and the massacre of millions of people.

"My poor friend! The military situation favorable for you? Do you not know that in France we are just beginning to be prepared in military fashion, and that only the advance guard of the English Army is upon the Continent? It would be imagined, perhaps, that a great favor was being done to us by clearing out of Poland, France, and Belgium, from which we shall in a few weeks hurl them all out with death and destruction.

"You say that you are for a peace without annexation. But what do you mean by that? That the old annexations are to be retained? If you think that we will leave to the Grand Turk the Greek, Armenian and Arabian population that he holds under his yoke, to the Hapsburgs the Poles, Rumanians, Czechs, Serbians. Croatians and Italians upon whom their heel rests, if you think we shall permit your people to force the German Kultur upon the Danes of Schleswig, the Poles of Poland and Silesia, and the people of Alsace-Lorraine, then it must be that you do not understand us. No annexation, no, but the freeing of annexed populations! When our task has been accomplished, my dear friend, then, and then only, shall we talk about peace!"

Commenting on this, the Frankfurter Zeitung says:

"This is how things look in the minds of these hysterical ones, and we do not conceal the fact that we have even toned it down a bit. All that is clearly revealed to the eyes of even the moderately sober person, does not exist for them—that the entire policy of the Entente countries for fifteen years and in part even longer, begot this war into which we were forced; that no one labored more eagerly for peace than the German Kaiser; aside from mentioning the manner in which they judge the military situation today, in which they may have always the excuse that they have been led astray systematically by the bulletins of our opponents.

"What can be the effect of approaching such minds with overtures of peace? Naturally, no other than that they will only be strengthened in their attitude, since they see in every attempt to meet them half way only a sign of weakness; that the manifesto is accompanied by a document declaring falsely that the German proletariat is not at all in agreement with the declarations that Scheidemann, Heine, and others have made. It is a good lesson that Hervé teaches. A lesson to whom? The Humanité says that the manifesto emanates from the minority of the German Social Democracy, including the notorious Liebknecht, Ledebour, Rühle, Mehring, Clara Zetkin, and Rosa Luxemburg.

"The Vorwärts today tries to protect these comrades by declaring that the manifesto bears no significance, and the Tagewacht even professes to know that those named had no part in it. We may safely leave it to the German Social Democracy to deal with the few manifestants. The matter has no importance any way; it is instructive only, on the one side, as showing the psychology of political weak-mindedness, and on the other a glimpse into the French soul of today. And in order that the humorous also may not be lacking, the Figaro asks the French Socialists if they do not see that the manifesto considers them naive and tries to dupe them. So Liebknecht and his comrades are emissaries of the German Government!

"That Hervé and his ilk make use of the phrase about the deliverance of annexed peoples is a part of their stock in trade. The rest do not stop at such pretexts, but say outright what they mean in the matter. Thus recently the Lyons Republicain wrote:

"'We shall set fire to no house in Trier, Koblenz, [illegible] Strassburg (by means of aerial bombs) —that would be a desecration, for all those cities were French and are on the point of becoming so again.'

"In fact, the matter is quite clear. For centuries France has ever and again fought with Germany for its position in Europe. It cannot realize as final the fact that in 1871 it was crowded out of Central Europe, and it will never be resigned to this until it has been so whipped that all desire to stretch out its hand for the Rhine will depart from it. Perhaps some time later on it may become possible to find an acceptable relationship with it, but today the sympathy which France enjoys in many German circles is as groundless as it can be, and devoid of all historical insight. We have here gladly treated the manifesto and the answer thereto, for it may lead many a person to revise his views. It will alter nothing in the German social democracy; a few splinters have fallen from it, but it stands firm and true to the German cause."

OLDTIMER AT MONTREAL.

Donald MacDonald Will Start at June 8 Meeting.

The closing of the stakes for the Montreal Jockey Club meeting in Canada from Tuesday June 8, to Tuesday, June 15, inclusive, will establish turf history through the entry of Donald MacDonald, a horse that has, perhaps, had a more checkered career than any now bearing silks. Donald MacDonald is the 9-year-old son of Sombrero and imported Berriedale, and he has twice been thrown into the discard through breaking down in what was supposed to have been a hopeless manner.

He was first raced by Phil T. Chinn in Kentucky, and was one of the greatest winning two-year-olds of his season. He was raced as a three-year-old with as great success and again as a four-year-old at Moncrief Park at Jacksonville, where he broke down and was disposed of for a small figure at public auction. He then got a long period of rest and later was rejuvenated by S. A. Clopton, who raced him the next season and afterward disposed of him to Dick Williams, who, in turn, raced him.

During the season of 1913 Donald MacDonald, after having gone wrong again, won the majority of his starts on local tracks and was considered one of the greatest winners of the season. He was carried over the winter and raced again last season without marked success. He started eleven times and was afterward sold to F. E. Brown, his present owner.

He is being trained by "Slim" Ownbey and worked five furlongs recently on the Pimlico track in 1:05, which would be regarded as a creditable workout for any horse.

The going at the Canadian track is fast being put into condition for the arrival of the horses which will be shipped there from Baltimore and the horses owned by Canadian turfmen which are now at the course are each day showing improvement in their work.

TO SELL HAGGIN STABLE.

Last Horses of Famous Turfman to Go at Auction.

The estate of the late James Ben Ali Haggin will shortly sell the thoroughbreds at Elmendorf Stud, Kentucky, and nearly one hundred famous brood mares will go under the hammer. Prominent among this number are Ballot, for which Mr. Haggin paid $50,000; Sain, the sire of Jack Atkin and Nealon; Hessian, last of the sons of Watercress at stud service in this country; Hamburg Belle, Pearl V, the dam of Water Pearl, and Colonial, dam of Hessian.

The disposal of the Elmendorf Stud will mark the passing from American racing of a family that has been prominently identified with the racing and breeding industry for upward of half a century. In the golden days of American racing Mr. Haggin marketed the produce of upward of a thousand brood mares at the sales paddocks at Sheepshead Bay, and it required from three to four days to dispose of his yearlings.

After the legislation hostile to racing had been written into the law of this state in 1908 the cleaning up of Elmendorf began. Mr. Haggin shipped 250 mares and 25 stallions to the Argentine Republic, and 20 stallions and 50 mares to the markets of Europe. The thoroughbreds to go under the hammer at the forthcoming sale are what were left at Elmendorf after this debacle.

JAPAN'S EMBASSY BREAKS SILENCE

Says the Coercion of China Was in the Interests of Peace.

REMOVES GERMAN MENACE

China Unable Otherwise to Protect Herself Against Future Teutonic Aggressions.

REPROACHED AS INSINCERE

And for Violating Confidence in Making Details of the Negotiations Public.

WASHINGTON, May 9.—The silence which has been rigidly maintained by the Japanese Embassy here throughout the long course of negotiations over Japan's demands upon China was broken tonight by the issuance of a statement prepared by the Foreign Office at Tokio, outlining the Japanese Government's reasons for submitting demands at this time and reviewing the various stages of the negotiations at Peking.

Since this statement was written Japan has presented an ultimatum which brought about China's acceptance of a revised draft of the demands. As accepted, the draft eliminates or puts aside for future consideration some of the demands most objectionable to China, and it is understood to contain no features which officials of the United States Government regard as contravening American treaty rights.

"The Imperial Government have, in the proposals lately presented to the Chinese Government," says the Japanese statement, "made it their main object to adjust matters relating to and to meet the new situation created by the war between Japan and Germany, to strengthen the friendly relations subsisting between Japan and China, and thus to insure permanent peace in the Orient. They, in formulating these proposals had taken special care to avoid those which might be deemed to conflict with the principles of territorial integrity, equal opportunity and the open door which Japan had occasion time and again to declare the powers.

"Accordingly, these proposals include, among others, those relating to the disposition of the German rights in the Province of Shantung, those relating to the recognition of the special position and interests which Japan posseses in South Manchuria and in Eastern Inner Mongolia, those relating to the solution of various questions which have for years been pending between the Japanese and the Chinese Government.

Guarding Against Germany.

After reciting the text of the original five groups of Japanese proposals the statement proceeds to an argument to sustain the Japanese claims. Regarding Shantung, it is alleged that China absolutely lacks the power to prevent Germany from recovering that province and becoming in the future a source of disturbance in the Far East. Therefore, it is asserted that it was natural that Japan, having with great sacrifice driven Germany out of Shantung, should take measures to dispose of her rights there and prevent a recrudescence of German influence there.

Touching Manchuria and also Eastern Inner Mongolia, it is said that Japan's relations are especially close, geographically and politically, commercially and industrially, and that since her two successful wars the predominant position of Japan therein has been recognized both at home and abroad.

The Foreign Office reproaches the Chinese Government for the violation of an understanding with Japan that the conferences were to be strictly confidential, for having made public the Japanese proposals in various exaggerated forms and having endeavored to stir up ill-feeling among the powers against Japan, and for attempting to shake the confidence placed in Japan by her allies. China is also charged with making absurd demands, such as the unconditional retrocession of Kiao-Chau and indemnity for the damage caused China by the Japanese military operations, and with showing from the first the lack of a sincere desire for a satisfactory conclusion of the negotiations.

Japan's "Great Concessions."

Recognizing that the satisfactory conclusion of the negotiations was most important for the maintenance of peace in the Far East, the statement declares that the Imperial Government treated these Chinese contentions with every consideration, and, in a spirit of conciliation, has made great concessions. These are embodied in the revised drfat of the Japanese proposals presented to the Chinese negotiations on April 25 which, with the omission of the fifth and last group, were finally accepted by the Chinese negotiations yesterday, thus closing the negotiations.

Regarding Eastern Inner Mongolia, in the new draft, the proposals are said to have been confined "to absolutely necessary matters," while regarding the Hanyeh-Ping Company (iron mining and milling) the proposals were confined to the matters already acquiesced by the Chinese Government at the preceding conferences. The Chinese form of proposal respecting the non-alienation of coast territory was accepted. The request relating to advisors, ownership of land for schools and hospitals, and the proposition concerning the province of Fuk-ien were all altered, the statement says, to meet the Chinese view. As regards South China railways, relations with third parties were especially taken into consideration. The question of the "right of preaching by Japanese missionaries" was reserved for futu re negotiations, while those relating to police and the ownership of sites for churches were withdrawn.

Outline of the Revised Draft.

The revised draft as finally adopted therefore, as outlined by the oreign Office, was practically as follows:

Japanese subjects are permitted to lease or buy land for buildings and commercial and industrial uses or agricultural purposes in South Manchuria, to travel and reside and conduct business therein under passports issued by the local Chinese authorities and under obligation to obey the Chinese law and to pay taxes under approval by the Japanese Consuls. The latter officials will try criminal and civil suits where Japanese are defendants, but in the future, when the judicial system is completely reformed, all suits involving Japanese will betried wholly by Chinese courts.

In Eastern Inner Mongolia joint enterprises of Japanese and Chinese in agriculture and auxiliary industries are permitted. China is to consult Japan before contracting either railway loans or loans to be secured by taxes. China must increase the number of open ports.

Regarding the Hanyeh-P'ing Company, China agrees to joint management between the company and Japanese capitalists, not to confiscate it or nationalize it or to permit it to contract any foreign loans other than Japancse.

Regarding non-alienation of the Chinese coast, the Japanese Government is satisfied with the Chinese promise not to alienate or lease to another power any territory or island.

It was agreed to "keep on record," without acceptance, the fifth group of demands, to which hina was unalterably opposed. These include the proposals that the Chinese Government shall in case it be deemed necessary in the future, employ Japanese advisers; that in case Japanese subjects delire to lease or purchase land for the purpose of building schools or hospitals in the interior, the Chinese Government shall send military officers to Japan in order to make arrangements directly with the Japanese military authorities either for the purchase of arms from Japan or for establishing an arsenal in China under Japanese and Chinese management; that the Chinese Government shall grant to Japan the desired railway concessions in South China in case it becomes clear that there is no objection in this respect on the part of any other power, and that the Chinese Government shall engage not to grant any other power concessions to build shipyards, naval or military establishments or to invest capital in Fu-Kien Province.

Under the agreement, if Japan, at the peace conference after the war, obtains the right of free disposal of Kiao-Chau she promises to return it to China, conditioned upon its opening as a commercial port, the establishment of a Japanese settlement, or of an international settlement, if required by the powers, and satisfactory arrangements for the disposal of the German public properties. The statement recites that Japan is certainly under no obligation to return it to China, but offered of her own free will to do so because she was anxious to promote her friendly relations with China and maintain general peace in the Far East.

Both the Japanese Embassy and the Chinese Legation officials agreed that the negotiations had closed with the acceptance yesterday by the Chinese Government of the amended Japanese proposals. It is not expected that it will be necessary to reduce these to the form of a treaty, but that the negotiators will simply initial a memorandum disclosing the results of the conferences which were in progress for three months.

CHIEF ADVANTAGES GAINED BY JAPAN

Forecast of Terms of the Treaty to be Concluded With China.

PEKING, Monday, May 10, 1:30 A. M.—Having reached an agreement with respect to Japan's demands on China, the plenipotentiaries of the two countries will now proceed to draft a treaty. The following are the important points in the terms of agreement:

Group I., relating to Shantung Province—Articles 1 and 2 stand as in the original demands. These provide that China will give her full assent to the transfer to the Japanese by the German Government of all rights and privileges heretofore enjoyed by Germany in Shantung, and that within the Province of Shantung or along its sea border no territory or island shall be ceded or leased to a third power.

Article 3 provides that China shall construct a railway from Chi-Fu or Lung-Kow to join the Kiao-chau-Chinan-Fu Railway, with Japanese capital.

Article 4 provides that China must open numerous treaty ports in Shantung after consultation with Japan.

Group II., relating to South Manchuria—Article 1 stands as in the original demands. Article 2 provides that the Japanese shall be permitted to lease land in South Manchuria, temporarily or perpetually, for trading, industrial, and agricultural purposes.

By the first clause of Article 3 the Japanese shall be permitted freely to reside, travel, trade, and engage in industrial pursuits in Manchuria. The second clause provides that the Japanese will submit only to police and taxation regulations approved by Japan. Civil and criminal cases shall be tried same nationality as the defendant Land disputes between Japanese and Chinese shall be tried by the joint Chinese and Japanese authorities, according to the Chinese laws and customs.

By Article 4 Japanese subjects shall have the right to work in nine mining areas.

Article 5 gives Japan the opinion of constructing any of the Manchurian railways which China ma wish to build in the future, and also an option on Chinese loans, with Manchurian taxes as security.

Article 6 gives preference to the appointment of Japanese political, financial and military advisers. Article 7, which relates to the control and administration of the Kirin-Chang-Chun Railway, stands virtually as in the original demands.

Article 8 continues in force former Chino-Japanese treaties regarding Manchuria, except where the present treaty otherwise provides.

Inner Mongolia Group—Article 1. Japan must be consulted before any foreign loan can be secured by the Mongolia taxes.

Article 2. Japan must be consulted before any foreign loan can be contracted for railway construction in the province.

Article 3. Treat ports must be opened, subject to consultation with Japan.

Article 4. The Japanese jointly with the Chinese may undertake agricultural and incidental industrial enterprises.

Group III., relating to the Hanyed-Ping Company—China consents to the company becoming a jointly owned Chino-Japanese concern, and engages not to attempt to thwart the consummation of this plan.

Group IV., known as the Special Group—China engages to proclaim that hereafter she will neither order nor lease any coastal territory to any power.

Group V. (General Group)—Articles 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 7 are regarded as unfinished business, China pledging herself to a discussion of these at some future date.

Article 3 has been eliminated. Article 6 has been displaced by pledges that China shall undertake no military or naval preparations, nor authorize foreigners to undertake such preparations, on the Fu-Kien coast in the future.

JAPAN CANCELS FORCE PLANS.

Preparations Against China Called Off—Revolutionists Still Active.

TOKYO, May 9.—The Japanese Government tonight announced that the naval and military movements in connection with the Chinese situation had been cancelled.

Leaders of the Chinese revolutionary movement who are now in this city declare China's acceptance of Japan's ultimatum will have no effect on their plans and that they will strike when they believe the time is ripe. The assert that it was a foregone conclusion that China would accept Japan's demands as modified, and allege that President Yuan Shih-kai requested the application of pressure to justify him in yielding. The revolutionists proclaim that Yuan Shi-kai aspires to become Emperor and say he attempted to obtain Japan's consent to such a coup with a promise to help China crush a revolution if one began.

ALASKA FOX FARMS REPORT FAILURES

Deputy Commissioner of Fisheries Puts the Chief Blame on the Government.

OBJECTS TO SHORT LEASES

Urges Longer Terms for the Use of the Pacific Islands and a Reduction in Rentals.

Many failures in the new industry of fox farming in Alaska are recorded by E. Lester Jones, Deputy Commissioner of Fisheries, in the report on his recent investigations in Alaska for the Department of Commerce. He finds that the promise of big profits caused many to rush into the business, and small fortunes were sunk by men who did not understand the difficulties of the industry.

The rush to raise foxes, the Commissioner says, was due to the exorbitant prices paid for live black and silver-gray foxes raised in Canada. These prices, he declares, did not indicate a healthy condition in the industry. Nevertheless there was a rush to raise foxes in Alaska in the hope of reaping big profits quickly. One of the chief reasons for the large majority of failures, according to the Commissioner, was the Government's system of leasing certain islands to prospective fox farmers at a minimum of $200 a year for five years. The system was intended to encourage fox raising, he points out, but in reality it proved one of the chief obstacles in the way of success.

"Two hundred dollars per annum does not seem much to people when they hear of foxes being sold for $5,000 to $10,000 a pair," he says, "but these unnatural and artificial prices cannot possibly apply to the islands situated in the Pacific Ocean off the coast of Alaska. The quality of the fur from these islands is not as good as that from inland areas further north. The man who goes out to that isolated country to carry on his work alone has a hard row to hoe. With a capital of say $3,000 he must lay aside $800 to pay for his lease for the first four years, as he must not expect any return from his initial stock before the end of that time. Then he has to buy his foxes for a starter. Supposing he buys half a dozen blue foxes, the cost will be in the neighborhood of $1,200. There is $2,000 gone already, and the balance will be well utilized in feeding himself and his stock and in paying other expenses.

"I have not allowed anything for corrals, for in most cases on these islands the foxes do better to run at large, but it must be understood that on many of the islands of Western Alaska, including some of those offered by the Government on lease, there is not enough natural food to take care of what would ordinarily constitute a fair number of foxes for such a ranch. Therefore, a man must provide food the year round. If he does his own work he has no income for the first four years. If he is fortunate enough to have a good position and still more fortunate in securing a reliable man to look after things for these four years, the chances are that matters will be in pretty good shape at the expiration of his lease. Then what is going to happen? Some other man may outbid him, and time, labor, and buildings are all gone.

"The Government, if opening a reservation in one of our Western States, would permit the land to be acquired free, under certain restrictions, and I cannot understand just why any man who is reliable and industrious and willing to go out and help to develop that far away frontier country of Alaska should not be encouraged by the same privileges instead of being hampered and disheartened at the start.

"If it seems wise to lease the islands at $200 per annum or thereabouts, I should certainly be in favor of arranging it so that after the first five years a man would receive a rebate of perhaps half of the leasing price paid by him when he has proved his good faith or I would suggest a sliding scale for leasing these islands at $50, for example, for the first five years and then a stationary price for the next ten years with the privilege of renewal, if desired, for another ten years, and so on.

"Under the present leasing system, at the end of five years a man may lose the island where his money and efforts were spent during the life of the lease. I would suggest that the men who have already leased these islands should be advised at once that the Government extends the right to the leasing of their islands to ten years, with the privilege of renewal for ten more. This would be highly satisfactory and would create confidence and satisfaction, which do not exist today among those who have leased islands or are contemplating such a step."

Mr. Jones believes that the Government could easily remedy conditions by lowering the rental price on these islands, so that it comes within a poor man's means and by granting liberal extension of leases so that the farmer may have plenty time to develop his industry.

"The present system does not seem just or right," he concludes. "The poor man without means is the one who should be assisted in undertaking this work. He should have the support of the Government and not be handicapped or held back by having some hardship imposed upon him."

HAMBURG SHOWS FEW SIGNS OF WAR

"Business as Usual," Except for Shipping, and Little Diminution of Animation.

BUT THE HARBOR IS ASLEEP

Long Lines of Vessels Tied Up at Wharfs—Hamburgers Proud of Sacrifices They Have Made.

From a Staff Correspondent of THE TIMES.

HAMBURG, April 9.—Of all the cities of Germany, Hamburg certainly has been hit the hardest by the war, and yet, your first impression—and your last—is that life superficially is as normal here as in Berlin, or, as I saw it in London during the first two months of the war. There are relatively fewer men on the streets here than in Berlin, the big hotels are not well-filled with paying guests, the American bar of the Hotel Atlantic (well-known to American globe-trotters) sold only thirteen drinks today, your correspondent was told—these and a few other little clues that have to be searched for diligently alone give away the fact that a state of war exists, with a naval end to it, unless you go down the harbor.

Whenever the municipal steam tender Hamburg, which transported your correspondent down the Elbe and back, blew its shrill whistle, you had an almost uncanny feeling, for there were no steamships, no incoming or outgoing craft, to get out of the way of on that deserted river. Tied up at interminable wharfs you saw that proud merchant marine now reduced from temporary paralysis, to right and left of you, forests of masts and smokestacks with no steam curling. It was as if some enchanter had cast an evil spell over the once lively harbor, putting it to sleep. A German battle cruiser in gray war paint and three rakish torpedo boat destroyers looked like watchdogs guarding that frightened flock of merchant ships huddled in port.

The tender tied up at one of the many wharfs of the giant Vulcan Shipbuilding Works, and, walked through a long dry wharf, was invited to climb over a multitude of steel and iron impedimenta, then go up a narrow gangplank through a hole in the side of the Imperator, anchored alongside. The Imperator, not being about to sail for America and consequently not having its usual ballast of American millionaires and freight and coal, rode high out of the water, so I had to make my entrance through one of those iron doors below the normal waterline; and, as the elevators weren't running, we correspondents, long accustomed to the hardships of riding in limousines, had to climb half a dozen flights of stairs to get to the saloon and the upper decks.

Imperator Kept Shipshape.

Inside, the Imperator looked as if the family had gone away for the Summer, and the housekeeper were taking things easy in consequence. A few stewards, in white jackets, were on the job, tidying up a bit. Most of the furniture was covered over, but the grand saloon and lounge was all shipshape and in good order to receive distinguished visitors. Here I met an old acquaintance—Captain Kier of the Imperator, who had not deserted his ship.

Captain Kier was filled with the unbounded optimism that fills all German seamen.

"We'll soon be in New York again," he laughed cheerily. "That's all we want. It won't be long now. Hope the new docks at Forty-second Street are all ready for us by that time, so the Imperator won't have to land at Hoboken."

For Captain Kier intimated that from Hoboken it was a long way to Times Square and Hammerstein's.

Equally breezy was Second Officer Pluegger, who also had stuck by the ship. He thought they would have the Imperator all in good trim to sail for New York the moment the flash came that the treaty of peace was signed. He believed the Imperator would certainly be the first boat out of Hamburg after that coming historical event.

As you sat here in the lounge or the Ritz-Carlton restaurant or the smoking room you had the most curious view of the world—from an ocean liner. You looked out of the windows and saw the tops of red brick factory buildings on one side, on the other, not a hundred yards away, green meadows and a dirt road.

Captain Kier led the way up to the commander's bridge, where a better view was to be had. The big steering wheel of the Imperator, you noted, was tied fast with a piece of rope.

Moored close to the Imperator was half of a battleship, just the dark hull, for work on the superstructure had been abruptly terminated by the war. I was told that it was a Greek battleship, and a German humorist explained that the reason it hasn't been completed was because the armor plate and guns had been ordered in America, and delivery had unfortunately failed so far.

From the Captain's bridge of the Imperator you saw a panorama that was not lifeless, for it was 5:30 P. M., and the thousands of employes of the Vulcan works, constituting the day shift, were knocking off work and steaming out of the huge works in dense columns. I gathered that the Vulcan works were not only working to capacity but were putting in overtime, running in day

PROGRESS OF JAPAN CREDITED TO US

Baron Shibusawa Says America Caused the Awakening of His Country.

DIFFERENCES EASILY SETTLED

Noted Political Leader Likens the California Question to a Corn on Our Little Toe.

"With mutual regard to international courtesy and due sympathy with mutual grievances the question would undoubtedly be solved without much trouble," says Baron Shibusawa, the Japanese financier, in a reference to the differences between the United States and Japan. The promotion of more friendly relations with the United States on the part of Japan, he adds, is an obvious as well as an imperative necessity.

Baron Shibusawa's article in which he expresses so earnest a hope for improved Japanese-American relations is in the April issue of the Japan Magazine of Tokio, a copy of which has been received at the Japanese Consulate General in this city.

"It is the constant hope," Baron Shibusawa continues, "of every patriotic Japanese that relations between Japan and the United States will grow stronger and warmer, and we trust that the same spirit prevails among Americans. In that country the anti-Japanese spirit now appears confined to one corner, where Japanese nationals feel more or less discomfort. But in the United States as a whole our people are well treated and entertain nothing but the best of feeling."

Sixty years ago, Baron Shibusawa points out, Japan was an isolated nation "dreaming in idle tranquillity and indifferent to the affairs of mankind," the result being the steady progress of the rest of the world, while Japan stood still. It was then, he adds, that the United States awakened Japan to her true condition, and from that awakening may be traced the wonderful progress of the Japanese people in the last half century.

"This awakening," the writer continues, "led to the restoration and the establishment of the Imperial Government on its present sure basis, so that, with the consent or the whole nation, we were able to enter into friendly relations with America and the nations of Europe. Japan has ever had and ever will have a feeling of deep gratitude especially to America for these benefits. We are sincerely thankful for all that America has done for us."

Of all that Japan has learned from the West, says Baron Shibusawa, a great deal has been chiefly learned from the United States, notably in banking. Japanese banking, he says, owes its present prosperity largely to American influence.

"In the year 1870," he continues, "the late Prince Ito made an investigation of the financial organization of the United States, learned all about the system of banking in that country, and introduced it into Japan without alteration. The banking system of Japan was exactly that of America. I ought to know, as I was the one who undertook to put the system into operation.

There is no doubt that on the whole, both commercially and internationally, America and Japan entertain nothing but the best of feelings toward one another, with the exception, as I have already suggested, of a small section in California, and there is no real ground for apprehension as to the future relations of the two nations. Both countries have established the custom of sending prominent men to either country to investigate conditions and to help to clear up misunderstandings. Dr. Matthews and Dr. Gulick recently visited Japan, representing some of the Churches of America, and these two gentlemen did their best to improve relations between Japan and America. The California question may now be likened to a corn on the little toe of America—by no means a deep-rooted disease.

"The real reason delaying the solution of the California problem is that both sides insist on conditions advantageous to one side only. With the introduction of more mutual sympathy the adjustment will soon come. At a reception of the above two gentlemen we talked the matter over without reserve and at that time I ventured to assert that it was a question that concerned America; the California question is an American question, and it is the duty of America herself to solve it.

"Baron Kato, our Foreign Minister, who was present on that occasion, also remarked without reservation that Americans and Europeans treat each other with consideration and sympathy without any discussion as to an Anglo-European question; and why can it not be the same with Americans and Japanese? Evidently they lack sympathy with the ways and opinions of Oriental people.

"In conclusion, I believe that the question between Japan and America can best be solved by mutual concessions. It should be regarded as a moral question on both sides. It is a question of ethics. It is not a question of reason but of feeling. With mutual regard to international courtesy and due sympathy with mutual grievances the question would be solved without much trouble."

Decrease in Foodstuffs.

The following figures, taken from official statistics, are interesting to those who are statistically inclined. They give a comparison of the amount of fruit and vegetables sold during the first three months of this year and last year:

	1914. Tons.	1915. Tons.
January	14,500	12,700
February	16,000	13,500
March	16,000	10,500

This would indicate a decrease of from 20 to 33 1-3 per cent. for this central wholesale market, which supplies all Hamburg with fruit and vegetables. The decrease can be accounted for partly on the theory that the people of Hamburg have succeeded in limiting their consumption partly because of the many thousands of men who have gone to war and partly because the big merchant fleet no longer provisions in Hamburg.

As bearing on the possible source of Hamburg's food supply, the following statistics of the number of freight carloads coming to market by months is significant:

	1914. Carloads.	1915. Carloads.
January	34	226
February	9	191
March	23	263

This is an astounding increase, showing that the bulk of Hamburg's fruit and vegetable supply is no longer coming in farm wagons from the surrounding countryside, but by rail.

The following comparative table of the value of goods sold by months, when compared with the percentage of the decrease in tonnage, indicates a slight increase in the cost of living.

	1914. Marks.	1915. Marks.
January	3,000,000	2,500,000
February	2,600,000	2,300,000
March	2,800,000	2,200,000

BIG FRENCH GAIN NORTH OF ARRAS

Germans Forced Back More Than Two Miles on Four-Mile Front.

BRITISH REPORT GAINS, TOO

Attack Successfully Near Fromelles and Repulse Assaults Near Ypres.

LOSE AGAIN, BERLIN SAYS

Germans Announce the Expulsion of British from Four Strong Positions in Ypres Region.

LONDON, May 9.—What appears to be the most important gain made by the Allies since the partial success of the German drive near Ypres is recorded in tonight's communiqué of the French War Office, which reports the capture of German positions north of Arras. The magnitude of the French success, in these days of trench fighting, in which gains of a few hundred yards are triumphantly proclaimed in Berlin and Paris, is indicated in the statement that the trenches captured were more than four miles long and in some places covered territory of two and one-half miles in width. The number of prisoners taken—more than 2,000—also indicates an engagement of considerable importance.

Whereas the German official report announces the expulsion of the British from several strongly fortified positions east of Ypres, and the capture of 800 English prisoners, Field Marshal Sir John French telegraphs that German attacks in that region today were repulsed with heavy losses. Moreover, he reports—and his claim is backed up by the French bulletin—that the British have gained ground near Fromelles, north of La Bassée.

The French official reports follow:

(Night Report.)—Between Nieuport and the sea the Germans made an attack, but were repulsed. They suffered heavy losses.

The British trops have gained in the region of Fromelles.

To the north of Arras we made important progress and also in the direction of Loos and the south of Carency. In the latter sector we captured at some places two and at other places three lines of trenches, extending over a front of seven kilometres, (about four and one-third miles,) which were very strongly fortified.

French Occupy Two Villages.

We have established ourselves in the village of La Targette and in half of the village of Neuville St. Vaast. The conquered ground at some places is four kilometres, (about two and one-half miles,) in width. We took more than 2,000 prisoners and six cannon.

In the Champagne we repulsed an attack near St. Thomas, on the edge of the Argonne Forest.

At Bagatelle we were able to verify the extent of the losses sustained by the enemy in yesterday's attack. The Germans had used, without any success, asphyxiating bombs and burning fluids.

On the rest of the front, notably in the Forest of Le Prêtre and at Silakerwasen, artillery engagements took place.

(Afternoon report.)—In the German position capturued yesterday near Lens we took about 100 prisoners.

In the Argonne at Bagatelle our troops repulsed three attacks, one during the night of May 7-8 and two during the day of yesterday.

On the rest of the front there have been artillery engagements.

Besides holding their line unbroken against German attacks, the British, according to Sir John French's report, inflicted some damage upon the Germans by dropping aerial bombs at various points. The report follows:

Last night the enemy continued his attacks east of Ypres and made further attacks today, which have all been repulsed with heavy losses. Our line there is firmly established.

This morning our first army attacked the enemy's line between Bois Grenier and Festubert and gained ground south and east toward Fromelles. The fighting in this area continues.

Our airmen made successful attacks on the St. André railway junction north of Lille and on the canal bridge at Dok. Furnes, Herlies, Illies, Marquelles and La Bassée were also bombed.

The German General Army Headquarters Staff today gave out the following official statement:

During the continuance of our attacks upon Ypres we drove the enemy out of his strongly fortified positions between the Fortuyn-Wyeltje and the Gheluvelt-Ypres Roads. We captured the villages of Fresenburg and Terleranhoek and took up important positions which command the heights. We took 800 English prisoners, among them sixty officers.

French attacks west of Liuvin and northeast of the Lorette Height failed, with heavy losses for the enemy.

Near La Bassée and Vitry we forced an aeroplane of the enemy to land.

A partial French attack, undertaken with the aid of fog and bombs, to the west of Perthes was beaten off by hand grenades.

In the Argonne, between the Meuse and the Moselle, and in the Vosges the day passed without anything of note.

MORGENTHAU SAVED ZIONISTS.

Ambassador Checked Turkish Persecutions and Loaned $100,000.

Confidential communications which have just been received by the Provisional Executive Committee for General Zionist Affairs in this city from representatives in Palestine and Constantinople report that, thanks in large measure to the efforts of Henry Morgenthau, the United States Ambassador to Turkey, and of the German Ambassador at Constantinople, the local political persecutions that threatened recently to put a stop to the activities of Zionist colonies and institutions in Palestine have been checked. High praise is given to Mr. Morgenthau for his untiring efforts in behalf of the Jewish colonists, both in checking the anti-Zionist agitation coincidental with the entry of Turkey is in the war, and in procuring support and the friendship and protection of the Turkish Government for them and their institutions.

"Mr. Morgenthau has constantly supported us with the greatest readiness," says the communication. "He has saved the Anglo-Palestine Bank and is helping us wherever he can. Besides, he has done much to raise the Jewish prestige through his own personality and his open intervention in American-Jewish interests."

The Anglo-Palestine Bank, which, while a Zionist institution, is an English corporation, on the outbreak of the war in Palestine issued checks of its own, which were accepted in Palestine as a sort of unofficial currency. The bank was closed by the Turkish Government, however, which

But Apprentices, Old Men, and Women Are the Workers—War Prisoners Make No Complaint.

From a Staff Correspondent of THE TIMES.

LUEBECK, April 10—The world war student cannot possibly spend time to better advantage than by paying a flying visit to Luebeck, where in six hours I saw and heard more that was illuminating than in the same length of time anywhere else at either front or rear.

There was a suspicious cheerfulness about the burghers and business men whom I met and talked with. They apologized for not being able to show me any sights on the large scale of Hamburg or Bremen, but still thought they had one or two things worth looking at. In response to the specific inquiry as to how business conditions were, one of them assured me that things were "almost as good" as in peace times, and the automatic rubbing of his hands indicated that they were probably better, in his line at least. His line was shipping.

By the accident of the world war, Luebeck, long the tailender of the Hanseatic League, suddenly finds herself at the head of the column today; after being for centuries eclipsed by the commercial importance of her big sisters, Hamburg and Bremen, Luebeck has regained, temporarily, her old mediaeval importance. For Luebeck is now of immense importance to the welfare and even safety of the German Empire—its only open commercial port.

After viewing the dead harbor of Hamburg it was almost a relief to steam in a launch up and down the river Trave and see scores of steamships with steam up; steamers loading, and what to a German was probably a far more agreeable sight, steamers unloading. I passed along miles of wharfes, and there were very few vacant berths. The ships were of the "tramp" size and type; all ships of small tonnage, and they all without exception (those that I saw) flew the flags of Denmark, Norway or Sweden.

They all had their submarine war paint on, or were then having it put on —the national colors on the sides of the ship, together with the steamer's name and nationality in gigantic white letters. The Hector Norge was just having the red and blue of Norway put on the hull by industrious members of the crew. The canny Scandinavians seemed at first blush to be making all the money, for I missed the Stars and Stripes in the line-up of neutral shipping, but piled high on one of the wharves I noticed several hundred bales of cotton, showing that the commodity was getting through and that Uncle Sam was getting his share of business too.

One of the Swedish ships was loading bags which I was told contained chemicals for the United States. Of more immediate interest to a war correspondent was what the ships were discharging; and while it would not do to be specific —for economic secrets can be as vital as military secrets—there is no harm in saying that you came away with a long standing suspicion rather confirmed, that German money talks Esperanto, and that its language is persuasively intelligent to all adjacent neutrals.

The Germans grow oratorical and even indignant, when talking for publication, about "paper blockades" and "paper embargoes"; but weeks of desultory private research have made it reasonably certain to me that Germany will not lack the necessaries of life—and death—so long as there is gold in the Reichsbank; it's gold against paper. A ride around the live harbor of Luebeck is worth while for even the professional observer.

My interest in Luebeck, however, had begun to perk up in the train several miles away, when I saw a long line of loaded cattle cars backed on a siding in front of a packing plant. Some idea of the humorous transformaiton of news values worked by the world war in its present stadium can be gathered from the fact that war correspondents become intensely interested in cattle cars with their plaintive short-horned inmates. [Elision by censor.]

Four chefredakteure, or chief editors, sleek in frock coats and silk hats, and all from the same newspaper, the Luebeckische Anzeigen, together with other local dignitaries, were waiting on the platform as a reception committee to welcome and guide THE TIMES correspondent and his twelve associates, representing, as the advance notice in the local newspaper truthfully said, the "leading papers of Sweden, Denmark, Holland, North America, Spain, and Greece"; also a millionaire merchant of Hamburg, now clothed in the field-gray uniform of a lieutenant of Landwehr, specially detailed by the army Kommando, while leading citizens, corporation directors, shipowners, captains of Luebeck industry, and two naval officers joined the polyglot caravan en route through town.

Huge Meat Supplies.

They led us first to and through the local "Kuelhaus" or cold storage warehouse. In the sheds adjacent hung at least 300 sides of beef, lined up with military precision. There was evidence that cattle of doubtful nationality were being slaughtered as fast as the butchers, who wore the orthodox white surgeon's robes, plus military caps, could work. The cold storage plant was now specializing in frozen meat exclusively, and we there and then viewed 15,000 hogs and 1,000 cattle carcasses, frozen hard as iron.

I would have been inclined to believe the figures, even if the manager hadn't told me so. For this manager was a rara avis among Germans, speaking with a strong American accent, in delightfully unprintable terms such as never fell from a native Teuton's lips who had never come in contact with the civilizing influences of Broadway or Chicago. He was Irvin G. Weber, sometime of Madison, Wis.—a semi-American citizen, for he admitted that he had taken out his first papers, and was a graduate of the Chicago stockyards. The Germans had imported him in 1912 to build this important cold storage plant, and the Germans, who are great respecters of American efficiency, won't let him go now, but hold him to keep the plant working at top speed.

"Within another four weeks we expect to have 25,000 hogs, 5,000 cattle, and 5,000 sheep 'salted away' in here," Mr. Weber said, adding significantly in a stage "aside": "None of it is to be used before Fall." He added the following little commentary on German system: "Mobilization was proclaimed at 6 P. M.; at 7 o'clock the navy took over the plant and I received orders from them."

How the Germans prepared to meet the English threat of starving Germany out, even before it was uttered, can be gathered from the fact that immediately after the outbreak of the war the cold storage plant was "cleared for action," all its peace-time produce "ousted," and work was begun on ing slaughtered in August alone. Remember me to God's country," said Weber on parting.

The trail of investigation next led to the extensive plant of the Luebecker Maschinenbau-Gesellschaft, which, in peace times specializes in building ships, boilers, misceHaneous machinery, and particularly dredges. The Managing Director seemed to be in particularly good humor, for he made many sly jokes and laughed at them himself which showed that business was good in spite of the earnestness of the times. He said their export trade was of course cut off, adding, "Russia was one of our best customers."

Work was proceeding on a few hulls of ships, on a couple of dredges; boilermakers were rivetting away at four boilers. All this, you thought, wouldn't make the establishment pay. The genial Director rather scouted your suggestion that they were also making ammunition, until you remarked that you thought you had seen a number of shells cut of the corner of one eye while being paraded past the door of a machine shop, whereupon he smiled as only Germans smile when they discover that you know almost as much about what is going on as they do, and said, "Well, just a few, maybe."

Kitchens for New Troops.

There was no hesitation in showing me the other chief war-product of the Maschinenbau-Gesellschaft. Out in the yard, where a string of flatcars was backed on a spur track, stood 100 brand new field kitchens or goulash cannon, lined up in two rows ready for shipment. In answer to my question the Director said that about 200 factories in Germany were making field kitchens "on the side." THE TIMES reader is apt to miss the full significance of this unless he remembers that the goulash cannon is regarded as more important than heavy howitzers and mortars; and that the Kaiser's men are never sent into the field without this most adequate of cooking facilities.

In other words, every new company formed has to have its new field kitchen, and from the rate at which new field kitchens are being turned out by the factories of Germany you can get the feeling of how new troops are being thrown in the field, in a way that you can get from inaccurate amateur statistics. These 100 new field kitchens which I saw lined up, some being swung by huge cranes on the waiting flat cars, represented 100 new companies of infantry, or eight regiments and a battalion, "ready for battle." And that was the output of only one factory of the 200 that are turning out field kitchens throughout the Kaiser's land.

This manufacturing plant was undoubtedly typical of similar industrial establishments throughout Germany. Few machine tools were idle. Those operating them were an interesting proof of the doctrine of the "survival of the unfittest—to fight." There were many young apprentices, many grayhaired, spectacled mechanics, not a few younger ones, who could not shouldered a rifle. And yet the shops were working to the limit of human efficiency, for I have discovered that the German workman, too, thinks that he is fighting for his country when he sticks to his job and does it well, particularly when the job is milling shells and making goulash cannon. As a significant index to German industries in war time, you note again before leaving that this manufacturing plant was enabled to work at its normal or supernormal capacity because the large orders lost by the shutting down of the export trade were more than compensated for by standing orders from the Government for war material, while the home demand for its peace-time specialties continued to be active.

Tin Cans Evolve Mystery.

To invite a "war" correspondent to visit a tin can factory, particularly one the bulk of whose product was destined for the conservation of fish, seemed futile; yet a visit to the Lubeca Works, Ltd., which was next on the program, proved to be a most instructive fifteen minutes. This plant was of course working full time and to the limit, because canned fish and other canned goods are going to be a necessary of life in Germany next Winter if peace doesn't come before that time. You can take it as axiomatic that any German industry which produces the necessities for either the fighters or the folk at home is working full time and coining money during the war.

Why this particular plant was able to work to capacity was explained by the sight of those busy can-making machines tended almost exclusively by women. There was, however, also a touch of war, for on the walls of the several factory rooms were maps of the several theatres of war, showing by means of little flags just where the Kaiser's armies were lined up in France and Russia.

The gaudily printed sardine tin tops coming out of one of the machines arrested your American eye and afforded food for speculation. These tops bore the legend "A1 Brand. Open at this end. Trade Mark Registered"; not a word of German, all English. Did they have so much tin on hand that they could afford to make cans for the export trade? It doesn't pay to be inquisitive in war time; you moved thoughtfully on and left the "mystery of the sardine can" unsolved. [Elision by censor.]

The Herr Director regretted that I could not also visit their branch factory, partly becausa there wasn't time, partly because it was "verboten" by the military authorities. [Elision by censor.] On the other hand, he took great pride in showing his store room of blank tin plates.

"The stock of tin in Germany is enough to last for two years," he remarked. There is something quite significant about the unanimity with which this same remark has been made to me about all kinds of things—"enough to last for two years," usually with the shrewd addition, "even if we couldn't get any more from outside."

After the thought-provoking launch ride around the bustling harbor I was taken to the local music hall—a mine of human interest, though unfortunately I had no time to work it. Here was a fascinating continuous performance, day and night; and yet the curtain was always down on the small stage, for fifty-nine wounded prisoners of war were both audience and actors in that music hall. The chairs, tables and seats had all been cleared out of the large auditorium, and in their place four rows of black enameled bedsteads set up. To the headboard of each bed was fastened a small blackboard telling the name and serial number of each convalescent prisoner in neatly chalked German longhand. Underneath the blackboard was fastened the prisoner's field cap and to the back of the bed hung his uniform.

The wounded prisoners had acquired something of German discipline. They stood, each man at the foot of his bed, erect, at attention, as we filed in. Only their eyes were lively with unsuppressible interest and excitement, for the arrival of a mixed troupe of thirteen neutral journalists with military and civil escort was a red letter day in their prison hospital life. They all wore clean blue and white striped "jumpers"—pajama-like affairs—and looked as if they were in the last stage of convalescence. About half were French and half Russians.

You looked down one row of individual bedsteads and read on the blackboards: "Bonnet, Conan, Pouches, Leteiller, Joeux," and down another row "Ignatienko, Krasawko, Zunko, Sarenski," &c. But even without the tell-tale blackboards you would have known which was which, for the methodical Germans had put the French on the left of the main aisle and the Russians on the right, where their beds were lined up facing each other. Piou Piou and moujik had one thing in common—they all were undersized. Private conversation with prisoners, of course, is not encouraged by the military authorities, but I took the chance of exchanging a few words of the vernacular with two of the French prisoners, and they grinned appreciatively.

They said that they were well treated,

RUSSIANS RETREAT ON 124-MILE FRONT

Are Out of Hungary, Vienna Reports—Have Won Victory There, Petrograd Says.

BATTLES IN EAST GALICIA

Czar's Forces Driven Across the Dneister—Loss of Baltic Port of Libau Admitted.

VIENNA, May 9, (via London.)—The Austrian War Office tonight made public the following official communication:

Our troops pursuing the enemy have crossed the Carpathian ridge and the frontier. Hungary is now free from the enemy.

The battle continues in Galician territory. The enemy is retreating along a front of more than 200 kilometers (about 124 1-3 miles) from the Vistula to the Uzsok Pass.

The Teutonic allies have passed victoriously the line of the Uzsok Pass, Komanosa, Krosno, Debica, and Szszucin.

In the Carpathian sector east of the Uzsok Pass and on the front in Southeast Galicia more violent battles are developing. We have captured several Russian positions. Strong infantil forces attacked our troops on the heights northeast of Ottynia, where the battle is continuing.

Though strongly reinforced, the bridge head at Zaleszoyki was yesterday stormed by us. The Russians are being pursued across the Dniester. We have captured 3,500 of them.

BERLIN, May 9, (via London.)—The following statement was issued today by the German General Staff:

In Libau we have taken a large stock of war material.

Before strong forces composed of all arms which the enemy has collected before Mitau our advance divisions sent out against this town are avoiding the enemy.

Northeast of Kovno the railway line between Vilna and Saarle was destroyed after we had wiped out a Russian battalion.

On the Niemen, near Sreduki, we attacked what remained of four Russian battalions which apparently belonged to troops who were beaten on the 6th and 7th of May near Rossinje.

Renewed Russian attacks on our positions on the Pilica were repulsed with heavy losses to the enemy.

In the southeastern theatre.

In pursuit of the beaten enemy the troops under General von Mackensen after the fight crossed the Wisloka River between Belke, east of Kymanow and Vryankat.

Under pressure of the Austro-German troops from the east and the north of Tarnow the enemy is retreating toward Mielec and over the Vistula.

On the vacillating Russian-Jarpathian front other German troops drove the enemy out of his positions on the railway between Mezo-Laboroz and Sanok. The number of guns and prisoners taken by us increases.

PETROGRAD, May 9.—The following official communication was issued tonight:

To the southwest of Mitau our troops made successful progress on the 7th. The enemy was forced to evacuate hurriedly strongly fortified positions at Janiszki, leaving behind a great quantity of booty.

Yesterday evening the enemy, taking the offensive, and supported by their fleet along the Littoral, occupied Libau after a fight with a small detachment of our territorial force.

To the north of the Narew, near Waoh, we repulsed successfully an irresolute German attack and threw back the enemy to his original position.

On the Nida everything is quiet.

In western Galicia on the evening of the 7th, the enemy continued his attacks with undiminished vigor, but with less frequency. In the district

SOIL COMPARED TO MAN.

The Earth Is Subject to Diseases Curable by Biological Processes.

For the better part of a generation Americans have been hearing of the exhaustion of the soil in this country. Abandoned farms in New England had to be given up because they returned such poor crops that their further cultivatio nwas not worth while. Important elements for plant life and growth were said to have been ruthlessly taken from them by wasteful farming and never restored, and it was propnesied that the same thing would happen to the great tarming lands in the Middle and Far West.

The popular impression existed that the earth was "an inanimate mixing bowl out of which plants ate, as cattle feed from the trough. What was not put in could obviously not be taken out, and since chemical analysis proved that plants do absorb mineral plant food elements the bowl must quite as obviously run empty unless we poured back as much as the crops took out."

When the United States Bureau of Soils undertook an investigation, however, it found no basis for the general deterioration of the soil thus suggested. It did find that properly cultivated soil increased in fertility in the course of time, but that certain changes in the soil, which might well be called "diseases," were responsible for the lessening of the crops; further, these diseases could be treated rather readily once they were recognized.

"The whole story has many analogies with certain theories of human diseases, and with many medical problems," says The Journal of the American Medical Association. "Out of this investigation has come the interesting conclusion that the soil is not a dead set of minerals in a mixing bowl, but an organism having hitherto unperceived likenesses to the body of man. Cultivation seems to be to the cropbearing earth what exercise and air are to human beings, and there are probably laws of hygiene and sanitation quite as applicable to the control of the soil's health as to that of mankind.

LONDON, May 9.—The Swedish steamer Carolina, bound from Charleston, S. C., for Stockholm, with a cargo of cotton, has been brought into Grimsby by British naval authorities. The Marie was stopped by a warship on suspicion regarding the destination of her cargo.

STAYS AS WAR NURSE.

Trenton Woman in Germany Volunteers for the War.

TRENTON, May 9.—A few weeks ago Mrs. Louise Voorhees, wife of Mahland Voorhees of 30 Gordon Street, went to Baden, Germany, to visit her mother. While she was there the Kaiser issued a call for nurses to go to the front, and Mrs. Voorhees responded. Her husband has received a letter from her, in which she says she will remain as a nurse until the war ends. She writes: "We will win, even if the last man has to go."

A COUNTRY OF REFUGEES

Homeless Population Existing in Abandoned Trenches and Dug-outs—No Crops Planted.

LONDON, May 9.—Robert Crozier Long, author and special correspondent, has written for The Associatiated Press, upon his return to Stockholm after an extended tour of the war-devastated districts of Poland, the following account of what he saw:

"'Finis Polonaie,' Kosciusko's epitaph on his country, has been realized.

"A tour of Central and South Poland and the Polish parts of Galicia convinces me of that. I visited all the chief towns and many villages, or ruins of villages, in 10,000 square miles of country lying between the Austro-German lines and the Vistula in a semi-circle from the Bzura to the Nida. I visited also the basin of the Dunajec and Wisloka, the theatre of the sanguinary May Day battle. The country is a desert, the home of nomads. I got my first glimpse of it on the Bzura, west of Warsaw, where, during a four months' artillery duel, every habitation has disappeared.

Chimneys All That Are Left.

"I reached this battle front first after dusk, and from an observation tower saw against the red background, formed half by the sun's afterglow and half by a blazing forest, the remnants of a dozen villages. These remnants were gaunt, erect pillars. This is typical of burnt-out Poland. A street of frame cottages, often straw thatched, catches fire from the first shell, and only ugly rows of brick chimneys are left. At night these long, double rows of chimneys present a gaunt effect.

"Everywhere except east of the road from Warsaw to Sandomir, blackened brick chimneys represent Polish homes. East of the road the damage is small and the main towns on the road to Radom, Sandomir, and Ostrowiec, each had only a score of ruined houses. Isolated factories all have been destroyed, mostly by airmen's bombs, on the suspicion that they were staff headquarters.

"On the road from Radom to the west the destruction increases progressively and on the Bzura, Rawka, and Nida Rivers, where the Russian lines face those of the enemy, hardly a stick remains. The Zemstvo worker Ognell, who accompanied me on part of my trip, says in the rest of Warsaw and Kielce, formerly two of Poland's richest provinces, only a third of the houses are unburned.

"Destruction is of three kinds: Accidental destruction by shells, destruction in hand-to-hand street fighting when the enemy was burned or smoked out, or intentional destruction to make a clear feld for artillery or rifle fire. I found that on twenty miles of the Nida River, between the town of Pinczow and its confluence with the Vistula, eighteen out of thirty villages either were burned or blown up in order that the Austrian mortars might search out the Russian trenches. Peasants had ten minutes to clear out. The Austrians set each village afire at six points, tearing down the brick chimneys with a lever machine especially invented for this purpose.

"The Governor of Radom assured me that in his province 500 villages had been burned. In the country held by Russia's foes conditions are worse, for here the fighting was more prolonged. The worst devastation is in the theatre of the November fight for the possession of Lodz. Refugees assure me that in a circle extending thirty miles around Lodz only five villages were spared.

Terrible Suffering of Population.

"Poland's population is suffering as no Europeans have suffered since the Thirty Years' War. Every second man is a refugee. Warsaw has 60,000 refugees, a third of them Jews. In Radom I found 15,000 refugees; in Kielc, 20,000.

"A Warsaw rabbi assured me that 100,000 Jews from the towns of Lodz, Piotrkow and Lowicz were without homes. Many refugees still tramp the roads begging despairingly from people themselves beggars. Many thousands are huddled in the tottering fragments of cottages, while 10,000 are shivering in the abandoned trenches and terraced Russian dugouts at Skaryszom.

In Radnor Province I found thirty unfed families cowering underground. Some were half naked, as they had spread their soaked clothing to dry on a barbed-wire entanglement. They told me of more pretentious underground dwellings improvised at Glowno, near Lodz. There the shell-torn terrace dugouts had been repaired and enlarged, stocked with tables and utensils, and even equipped with stoves.

"I met many refugees without food or money and mostly ill-clad. Near Ostrowice was a dreary procession of men in thick sheepskin coats without other clothing, women in men's trousers, and children in dresses improvised from shawls. They lost their homes in an Austrian night attack, in which four villages were burned. They had saved only a dozen ramshackle carts, filled with kitchen utensils, pillows, brilliant but malodorous rags, and scores of shrapnel cases used as tumblers. Children rushed after a Cossack patrol, begging bread. The Cossacks, tossing to the ground what they had, galloped away to escape the children's cries. I think few starve to death. One is touched with the universal charity, but many are emaciated, shivering, and forlorn.

"At Kielce is told the story of two heads of families who took their own lives. These men, with their wives and children, made a three weeks' pilgrimage from Piotrkow, now in Austrian hands. They got through a gap in the Austrian lines, but the wife of one was shot by a sentry, while the wife of the other died of exhaustion and one child was trampled in a panic-stricken flight of refugees. The commandant at Kielce assured me that the week before my arrival seven persons who had starved to death were picked up outside the town.

Future Will be Even Worse.

"Such is Poland's present. The future will be even worse. The country, ravaged and irreclaimable, begins to resemble the primeval Sarmatian waste. Roads, forests, and even fields have vanished. Many roads are still as von Hindenburg left them in his November retreat. They are chess-boarded with quadrangular cavities neck deep in rain water. Some still bear the Germans' ironical placard, 'No bathing here.'

"The roads which have been repaired cannot bring food to civilians, for all are crowded by parallel transport columns. The fields were destroyed by transport and artillery trains which, finding the roads too narrow, spread right and left, obliterating farms.

"Winter grain was not sown and there is no seed for grain for Spring. Everywhere are labyrinthine tangles of trenches faced by broad mazes of barbed wire. These peasants, knowing that the war will return, fear to remove. Arable land is a sandy desert, for trench diggers dug beneath the fertile surface and scattered the subsoil of sand.

"The worst, because it is irremedial, is the forest destruction. Some woods have been hewn wholesale to make causeways through morasses, some to pave roads, some to make a clear field for artillery, some shelled to bits because they afforded shelter for troops, some drenched with petroleum and burned. Up the lower Rawka and in reserve positions ten miles behind the Germans' loophole all big trees were used by them as cover for sharpshooters and the Russians shelled down the trees one by one. This forest devastation means for Poland generations of beggary.

"Conditions in Polish Galicia on the Dunajec and Wisloka Rivers are somewhat better. I passed many unruined villages and found Tarnow town, although shelled daily by 17-inch guns, living normally. General Radko Dimitrieff, who commands the Third Russian Army here, assures me this condition is general over all this territory. But since the May day battle the war is again passing over this spared country and 'Finis Galiciae' will soon also be a fact."

GENERAL CAREW INJURED.

Inspector of Territorials Thrown from Horse While on Vacation.

LONDON, May 9.—Lieut. Gen. Sir Reginald Pole-Carew, Inspector General of the Territorial Forces, was thrown from his horse today at Antony Park, Cornwall, where he was spending a short leave of absence. He was picked up in an unconscious condition, suffering from concussion of the brain. He is 66 years old.

OUR NEW PARIS EMBASSY.

Ambassador Sharp Rents a Fine House in the Avenue d'Eylau.

PARIS, May 9.—William G. Sharp, the American Ambassador to France, has taken a house in the Avenue d'Eylau, near the Trocadéro Palace. The dwelling is situated in excellent quarters of the city and is within seven minutes' walk of the Embassy offices.

When the lease to the residence so long occupied by American Ambassadors was given up, before Ambassador Sharp's arrival here, it was regarded by Americans as a misfortune. Suitable houses were then difficult to get, but since the war many important families have decided to remain in their country places.

Some forty private hotels were offered at moderate rentals to the Ambassador, and from them he and Mrs. Sharp chose the house on the Avenue d'Eylau. It is a four-story stone residence, and contains beautiful entertainment rooms, ten bedrooms and a fine garden.

The house belongs to Jean Bartholoni, who leaves his admirable collections of art, furniture, and silver in it. The residence will be occupied immediately by the Sharps.

GAS CO. PAYS BACK $12,000.

Philip Ottmann Proves Statements in Booklet Were False.

Lured by attractive statements in a booklet issued by the Blaugas Company of Cuba, Philip Ottmann, Vice President of the wholesale provision firm of William Ottmann Company, bought $12,000 worth of the company's stock. Becoming convinced that he had been deceived as to its value he sued and won the suit, and Justice Delehanty of the Supreme Court has ordered the company to return Mr. Ottmann's money to him.

The booklet set forth that the company wanted to sell $500,000 of its preferred stock, and that the money was to be used in building a plant on Havana Harbor for the manufacture from gas oil of a liquid illuminating gas. This gas, it was represented, would cost so little that the profits would be very large because gas sold in Cuba at $5.30 a thousand feet.

The defendants named in the suit include Louis H. Holloway, Vice President of the Hudson Trust Company; Robert H. Grimes, a lawyer; Edward P. Coe, a carpet manufacturer; Charles H. O'Neill, the President of the defendant company; Bart Dunn, under conviction for road frauds; Louis Arthur Cushman, President of the bakery firm of S. Cushman Son & Co.; Myron Sulzberger, a lawyer; Lehman Strauss and Albert Buchman.

In giving a decision in favor of Mr. Ottmann Justice Delehanty said that the defendants had to admit that the statements made in the booklet were misleading. The company never started to erect a plant, but abandoned the whole scheme after $75,000 worth of stock had been disposed of. The court said that under the laws of this State there was no doubt as to the liability of directors and officers of a corporation making statements that were not true in order to procure subscriptions for stock.

FUGITIVE HALTED BY SHOT.

Would-be Adviser of Policeman Gets Bullet in the Ankle.

With a bullet in his ankle, which had badly shattered the bone, and a charge of assaulting an officer lodged against him, John McKeon, 25 years old, of 53 Lynch Street, Brooklyn, was taken a prisoner to the Williamsburg Hospital yesterday morning.

The trouble started over McKeon's insistence in giving advice to Patrolman Morgan of the Clymer Street Station as to how to separate a horse and surrey from an automobile with which they had collided. When ordered to maintain silence McKeon became abusive, and the policeman attempted to place him under arrest. Assisted by several friends, McKeon resisted, and in the fight that followed escaped, and ran down Heyward Street. Morgan gave chase, and after several shots fired in the air had failed to stop the fugitive the policeman fired low, striking McKeon in the ankle. In the crowd which collected after the arrival of an ambulance Morgan saw a man who, he said, had aided in the escape of McKeon. The man—Thomas Gorman, 29 years old, of 126 Penn Street—was also arrested.

The collision occurred at Bedford Avenue and Heyward Street. Both the chauffeur of the machine, Thomas A. Schwartz of 198 Henry Street, Manhattan, and Michael Lorretto of 38 Oak Street, Manhattan, escaped injury, but the surrey was wrecked.

FINDS WIFE DEAD IN WELL.

Woodside Man Thinks Aged Partner Must Have Become Demented.

Mrs. Addie Lankow, 68 years of age, wife of Louis Lankow, of 13 Hancock Avenue, Woodside, L. I., was found dead yesterday afternoon at the bottom of an old well back of her house. Her husband, who had missed her early in the morning, did not think of looking in the well until he had searched the house and had inquired for his wife at the homes of several neighbors.

Dr. J. M. Dobbins of St. John's Hospital said the woman had been dead for several hours when found.

Mr. Lankow said his wife had been ill for some months, and that she might have become demented during the night and walked into the well. The police believe she committed suicide.

PRATT PICKS HIS AIDS.

Appoints Men to Guard State's Game and Forests.

ALBANY, May 9.—Conservation Commissioner Pratt today announced the appointments of Luewellyn Legge as Chief Protector in charge of the Division of Fish and Game, Clifford R. Pettis as Superintendent of Forests, William C. Howard as Assistant Superintendent of Forests, and A. S. Houghton of New York City as Secretary to the commission.

Commissioner Pratt at the same time announced the appointment of eighty-six forest and district rangers and mountain watchmen. Marshall McLean of New York has been designated by the Attorney General as counsel for the commission.

Free Eddie Foy on Gambling Charge

Eddie Foy, the actor, was discharged by Magistrate Ten Eyck in the Yorkville Police Court yesterday. He was charged with maintaining a poolroom. Frederick Strauss of 1,670 Broadway, who was arrested on a similar charge, was held in $500 bail. Nine other men were discharged. Foy was arrested on Saturday afternoon in a building in Broadway near Forty-second Street. Detectives found him using a telephone when they raided the place. As the detectives were unable to state the nature of the telephonic talk the case was dismissed.

J. P. MORGAN HOME; SILENT ON FINANCE

Expresses Horror on Learning the Details of the Lusitania's Sinking.

STANDS FOR THE CAMERAS

Will Not Discuss War Loans and Disregards Attack in the House of Commons.

"I am overcome with horror and the details are appalling," said J. P. Morgan about the sinking of the Lusitania when he returned yesterday afternoon from Europe on the American liner St. Louis. "I received the first news late on Friday night, but did not hear of the great loss of life until this morning, when Captain Porter sent me a wireless message from the Corsair."

The message was received aboard the St. Louis at 11:20 A. M., and read:

J. P. Morgan, S. S. St. Louis:
Latest report states 1,214 lost in Lusitania, including 137 Americans. A. G. Vanderbilt, Charles Klein, Justus Forman, and many children and women lost; 700 saved. Torpedoed without warning, 2 P. M., off Kinsale. Many died from exposure. Ship sank in fifteen minutes. Stock market tumbled Friday, but firmer yesterday. China apparently agrees to demands of Japan. Italy getting nearer war. Germany claims capture of Libau. Allies report some success Dardanelles.
PORTER.

Mr. Morgan appeared to be in the best of health and much benefited by his sea trip. He sailed from New York six weeks ago on the Philadelphia, and spent most of his time in London, with a brief visit to France. As usual, he was reticent in his remarks upon current events, and declined to discuss the British war loan, the French war loan, or the Russian credit.

When asked about the comments made in the House of Commons regarding the profit he made upon his contracts, Mr. Morgan replied:

"That is not an attack. You would not construe that as an attack, would you?"

He was asked if he had been subpoenaed to appear in the Supreme Court in the action for the recovery of Martha Washington's will. Mr. Morgan said he had not received a subpoena yet, and added that every one concerned knew he was perfectly willing to appear in court.

When he went on the upper promenade deck he saw a band of twelve photographers standing together, and, to their great surprise, he turned to them and said:

"Well, I suppose we had better get it over."

Then Mr. Morgan stood on deck in the bright sunlight and had his picture taken. Usually he avoids this.

He was accompanied on the voyage by Mrs. Morgan, and was met at the pier by Charles Steele, one of his partners. Mr. Morgan's steam yacht Corsair met the St. Louis at Quarantine and followed the liner to Pier 61, North River, at the foot of West Twenty-first Street. Captain Porter came ashore to greet his employer on the American Line pier.

After their baggage had been passed Mr. and Mrs. Morgan embarked on the Corsair and proceeded to their Summer home at Mattinecock Point, L. I.

Mrs. Reginald Brooks, who was in mourning for her fiancé, the Hon. Douglas Pennant, a Captain in the Grenadier Guards, who was killed recently in France and left her $380,000 in his will, was a passenger on the St. Louis. Mrs. Brooks said she was going to the Langhorne home, Greenwood, Albemarle County, Va., to get a complete rest. After spending six weeks with her family Mrs. Brooks will return to England totake up her Red Cross work at Plymouth with her sister, Mrs. Waldorf Astor.

Another passenger on the St. Louis was the Hon. Mrs. Oliver Brett, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. August Heckscher of 622 Fifth Avenue, who said that she had come over to visit her parents, bringing her five-year-old son Lionel, whose uncle is Lord Esher of England.

Edward Wilding, a naval architect connected with the firm of Harland & Wolff of Belfast, came on the St. Louis on business connected with a suit against the owners of the Titanic.

WARREN BIGELOWS AT LAW.

Wife Asks Separation and Husband Demands a Divorce.

J. Sidney Bernstein has been named as referee in the suit for divorce brought against Mrs. Ethel Clark Bigelow by her husband, Warren Bigelow, a member of the law firm of Black, Varian, Bigelow & Somers. Charles W. Smith, who is rich and who lives in New Rochelle, is named as the corespondent. The complaint alleges that Mrs. Bigelow and Mr. Smith were guilty of misconduct in June and July of last year at the Franklin Cottage, 129 Franklin Avenue, New Rochelle; at the Garondah Hotel, Rainbow Lake, in the Adirondacks in July and August, and at other times in New Rochelle and at 315 West Ninety-fifth Street, in this city. The Bigelows were married in 1904.

In her answer to the complaint, rMs. Bigelow made a general denial of the charges, and said that on April 3, 1914, and again on July of the same year the plaintiff and an unknown woman were guilty of the same offense alleged against her. Mr. Bigelow denies this accusation.

Last December Mrs. Bigelow began a suit for separation from her husband. They separated on Sept. 14 immediately after a quarrel at a dance at Park Hill, Yonkers. Shortly afterward Mrs. Bigelow's mother died, and Mr. Bigelow wote his wife a letter in which he said:

"Your situation and your troubles are very pitiable, and I am sorry for you, but sorrow for you and a desire to come back are two different things. I have the one but not the other."

Mrs. Bigelow says her husband also wrote her a letter in which he suggested a divorce in this way:

"Will you get a divorce or will you allow me to get one from you in some other State? I believe a divorce is the only right thing, for to me living separate and undivorced is the greatest of mistakes."

Justice Hendrick, who named the referee, denied Mrs. Bigelow's application for alimony because she owns about $50,000 worth of property and therefore, in the opinion of the court, could provide for herself until after the case was disposed of.

KANSAS LIKES COLD WATER.

Governor Kapper Answers Attacks of Liquor Dealers' Association.

Kansas is answering the widespread attacks which are being made by the National Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association. Governor Capper, in a recent interview, said:

"The liquor interests of the country are centring their attacks on Kansas. The country is being flooded with literature containing ridiculous and manufactured stories regarding the failure of prohibition in Kansas. With that monument to prohibition out of the way, they feel they have removed their greatest obstacle.

"The association has asserted that prohibition has brought the State below the average license State as regards moral, health, and economic standards. But, as a matter of fact, after thirty years of prohibition in the State of Kansas, statistics show that Kansas has more wealth per capita, more young men and women in colleges and the universities, in proportion of the population; more children in the Sunday schools; a lower death rate; a lower percentage of illiteracy; twenty-eight counties without a jail prisoner last year; forty-eight counties that did not send a prisoner to the State prison; seventy-eight that did not have an insane patient last year—these are just some of the things that Kansas can boast of."

HAD A DOUBLE BIRTHDAY.

Little Ruth's Anniversary Came While Crossing 180th Meridian.

Six-year-old Ruth Edith Clark, who is at the Imperial, has had an experience which comes to few persons, no matter how long they live. Ruth had two birthdays in April. They were real birthdays, too, and they came together. As a matter of fact, the two birthdays were about forty-seven hours long, and there was pelnty of time in which to eat the birthday cake the ship's steward had provided.

Ruth is the daughter of M. M. Clark, Superintendent of the Customs Service in British North Borneo, and was born at Sandakkan, which, according to the geographies, is the capital of that colony. It happened that the China, the Pacific mail steamship in which the Clarks came from Hongkong to San Francisco, crossed the 18th meridian on April 15, and that was Ruth's birthday. If the Clarks had been going west, the ship's calendar might have jumped from 14 to 16, and Ruth would have had no birthday at all, but coming east the day repeats itself, as it were.

There were more than thirty children on the China and there was a birthday party, with a big cake; then when the second day of Ruth's birthday came and parents had to explain how it was that she had two days of birthday, and another little girl whose birthday had occurred a few days before had only one, it was difficult to satisfy the young minds.

Mr. Clark, who has been in Borneo since 1905, says that the war has affected the exports of the colony very considerably.

"We ship mainly tobacco and cultivated rubber, and the market for those products has not been attractive since war started," he says. "The only industry that has maintained itself had been that of timber exportation, which has been going out to China as usual, though to London and the rest of Europe shipments have practically ceased.

"We have not had any alarms at Sandakkan on account of the war, though we had warships in the place, and two river gunboats were brought down from China. There are only about seventy whites in 10,000 population of Sandakkan, the rest being mixed Chinese and natives. In the whole colony, whose population is about 200,000, there are about 400 white persons.

"In British North Borneo are a number of German planters, but they have not given any trouble since the war began. They have been left to follow their own business, though they have been under supervision. As a matter of fact, each of them is known to everybody, and is on good terms with the British residents. I saw one of them in New York today who used to be the German Consul at Sandakkan. We are old friends.

"Our North Borneo rubber was coming into its own when the war began, and was realizing prices equal to the best grades from the Federated Malay States. Many of the planters are now going in for cocoanuts, which seem to offer a more stable future, with the greatly increasing demand for copra, or dried cocoanut, than either rubber or tobacco."

Mr. Clark, who is on a six months' leave, is on his way to England to place his family there so his children may attend school.

100 WILL TALK FOR PEACE.

Noted Speakers to Take Part in Carnegie Anti-War Campaign.

A thousand addresses by more than a hundred lecturers and college professors, supplemented by literature for the promotion of a better understanding of international relations, have been arranged by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace as part of a nation-wide campaign against war this Summer.

The endowment hopes to "crystallize into non-partisan, scientific examination" of international relations the interest in world affairs stimulated by the war. The lectures will be delivered at Chautauqua centres, Summer schools, and other places. Some of the speakers engaged are Hamilton Wright Mabie, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, Hamilton Holt, Atherton Brownell, the Rev. S. Parkes Cadman, and Dr. Thomas E. Green. Some will spend a week in each town they visit conducting a daily educational hour. Others are engaged by the Chautauqua for one-night stands. It is estimated that 4,000,000 persons will hear these discourses.

At Ithaca, N. Y., a Summer School of International Polity will be opened by the World Peace Foundation under the direction of Norman Angell. Here a non-partisan investigation of the war will be made by representatives from the large American colleges and universities.

"The work which we are undertaking is purely educational, scientific, and non-partisan," says Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, President of Columbia University and Acting Director of the Division of Intercourse and Education of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. "We want to know as a scientific fact whether it be true that man must go on settling his differences forever by war. If this should turn out not to be scientifically true we want to know how man is going to give the war method up and what he can substitute for it.

"There are no short cuts to peace. We believe that the process of investigation, of slow molding of public opinion marks the same sure road to the relief of the world. The problem of international peace has largely resolved itself into the job of disseminating a little intelligence among the educated. That is why we shall conduct a widespread campaign to disseminate intelligent international information during the next few months while public attention throughout the country is focused upon the subject of war."

The Division of Intercourse and Education of the endowment will give courses on international law, international relations, South American affairs, and Spanish in leading institutions of the country, and professors from Harvard, Princeton, Columbia, Michigan, Leland Stanford, and other colleges will conduct these studies.

LUTHERANS TO CELEBRATE.

Anniversary of German Reformation to be Observed.

Lutherans of New York have just formed a federation to arrange a celebration for the four hundredth anniversary of the beginning of the German Reformation. In the body are members of the General Council, General Synod, and Missouri Synod, and a meeting has been called tonight to elect officers and to discuss plans. The meeting will be held in St. Luke's Church in Forty-second Street, near Seventh Avenue. The date to be celebrated is put at Oct. 31, 1517.

Lutheran organizations are raising large funds, one of them $2,000,000, for Church extension. Another body is raising $1,000,000 for education.

OPEN HOLY ROOD CHURCH.

First Service in New Edifice Conducted by Bishop Burch.

Holy Rood Episcopal Church was opened yesterday by Suffragan Bishop Charles S. Burch, at Fort Washington Avenue and 179th Street. The church was founded twenty years ago at Broadway and 181st Street, but not until now has had a church edifice large enough to accommodate all its members. The building costs more than $100,000 and is built of rough Indiana limestone with gray terra-cotta trimmings. The chancel has an exceedingly beautiful altar of Carrara marble. The facade is taken from that of the Hereford Cathedral in England. The rector is the Rev. Dr. Stuart Crockett.

PREPARE BROAD PLAN FOR CITY HOME RULE

Convention Tomorrow Will Receive Amendment Reforming the State's System.

WILL CURB LEGISLATURE

And Forbid Mandatory Laws Creating New Offices Here—Convention Leaders Favor the Plan.

Special to The New York Times.

ALBANY, May 9.—The fight of New York City in the Constitutional Convention for a larger measure of home rule will begin this week. A proposal to incorporate in the revised Constitution a new article dealing with municipal government will be presented to the convention when it resumes work at noon on Tuesday. The proposed new article grants broad powers to every municipality to manage its own affairs within certain constitutional limits.

The amendment will represent the first attempt in the history of the State of New York to create a uniform system of municipal government. It will wipe out the present distinction between cities of the first, second and third class and place all municipalities on an equal footing with regard to self-government. The new article, also, will prohibit the Legislature from passing any measure affecting only one municipality.

If the new article should be incorporated in the revised Constitution it would cause the repeal by the next session of the Legislature of thousands of special laws now on the statute books and the substitution of a general city law, drafted on lines so broad that it would be applicable alike to New York City and the smallest city in the State.

The proposed new article has been under consideration for nearly three years. It represents the joint labor of men who as Mayors, or in other important offices, have been identified with the practical side of municipal government in cities in widely separated parts of the State.

Here are the powers that would be vested in the New York City Government—and in the Government of other municipalities as well—if the new article is made part of the Constitution:

The power to frame and amend its own charter and have it adopted and made effective by a majority vote at a referendum of electors within the boundaries of the city.

The right to fix the salaries as well as the functions of every official who receives his salary from the city Treasury. This would involve an absolute prohibition against any State legislation of a mandatory nature creating new offices or fixing the salary of any official in the city's service. In recent years an annual expense of $7,000,000 has been imposed on New York City by mandatory legislation of that nature.

The power to own and operate all sorts of public utilities, including water plants, traction lines, lighting plants, and public markets; the right to determine what is a public utility and the related right to obtain the possession of the necessary plants either through purchase, lease, or condemnation proceedings.

Broader powers with reference to its fiscal policy and with reference to local taxation, always within the constitutional limitation which prohibits any excess of bonded indebtedness above 10 per cent. of the assessed valuation of all the taxable property within the city and within the constitutional provision against any tax levy exceeding 2 per cent. of such aggregate values.

The proposed home rule article has been drafted by a committee of the Mayors' Conference, of which Corporation Counsel Arthur L. Andrews of this city is Chairman. The other members of the committee are Mayor Mitchel; J. B. Corwin, Mayor of Newburgh; H. L. Breen, Mayor of Watertown; Hiram L. Edgerton, Mayor of Rochester; James T. Lennon, Mayor of Yonkers; Cornelius F. Burns, Mayor of Troy; Walter T. Arndt, representing the Municipal Government Association, and Robert S. Binkerd, representing the City Club. At the final conferences, held here yesterday and today, in which the draft of the new article was considered, Corporation Counsel Frank L. Polk of New York City represented Mayor Mitchel, who is on a hunting trip out West.

A tentative draft of the home rule article was submitted by Mr. Binkerd today to ex-Mayor Seth Low, who is Chairman of the Cities Committee of the Constitutional Convention. Both Mr. Low, Elihu Root, President of the Constitutional Convention; ex-Secretary of War Henry L. Stimson, ex-Attorney General George W. Wickersham, and Herbert Parsons, all of whom are among the leading men in the convention, have been in close touch with the work of the committee for weeks and are said to be in sympathy with the purposes of the new article. In many of its essential features the home rule article embodies the views of Mayor Mitchel.

Statements made recently by leading delegates whose views will have considerable weight in the Constitutional Convention justify the prediction that the Republican majority will assume a friendly attitude toward the desires of New York City for a fuller measure of home rule. Senator Robert F. Wagner and ex-Speaker Alfred E. Smith, Democrats, who may be said to represent the Tammany view, have also expressed themselves as in thorough accord with the aims of the committee.

The support of William Barnes has been sought and it was said today had been promised. Corporation Counsel Andrews of Albany is a close friend of the Republican leader. He is also thoroughly committed to the home rule principle and has been, perhaps, the most active worker on the committee which drafted the new article.

By aiming to wipe out the distinction which has been drawn so rigidly between New York City and the smaller cities, it is believed that much of the opposition the plan would encounter from up-State Republicans under other circumstances will be avoided. The proposal to incorporate the new article in the Constitution will be presented by John Lord O'Brian of Buffalo, who is one of the Republican delegates at large to the convention.

TO DEMUR TO RIGGS SUIT.

Denial of Jurisdiction the Government's First Plan.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, May 9.—The Government has completed its answer to the bill filed by the Riggs National Bank asking an injunction restraining the Secretary of the Treasury, the Controller of the Currency, and the Treasurer of the United States from covering into the Treasury fines imposed by the Controller for the alleged failure of the bank to make certain demanded reports. The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia has set Wednesday next as the day for answer to be made, but it may be filed at any time before that. Technically there are three answers, one from each of the defendant officials, and they cover 148 pages.

It is understood that the first move of the Government on Wednesday will be to demur to the court's jurisdiction on the ground that the Treasury officials have discretionary power, and this discretion cannot be estopped. Treasurer Burke, it is understood, will avoid the major issues by taking the ground that he had nothing to do with the imposition of the fines or anything to do with the controversy, merely receiving the money turned over to him by the Controller or the Secretary.

The Government's answer, which is drafted by Louis D. Brandeis, chief of counsel; Samuel Untermyer, and ex-Assistant Attorney General Adkins, it is understood, reviews the whole subject of the controversy between the Treasury and the bank. Lengthy reference, it is understood, is made to stock transactions of the officers of the bank for many years past, to the Crocker National Bank transaction, and to a number of other points not directly at issue in the bank's suit for an injunction. It is said that agents of the Government have visited the office of a broker once close to the Riggs National Bank, seeking affidavits on certain stock deals.

As it is understood tonight, the Government's answer will reply not only to legal points brought forward by the bank, but in general will reply to suggestions from various quarters giving to the controversy a political complexion. This phase of the subject, it is understood, has received extended and emphatic consideration from the Government's counsel. It is probable that counsel for the bank will move to strike out this part of the answer as irrelevant, but if the Government files its answer tomorrow, it will have had publicity for two days before the case reaches court.

DISEASE AND PUBLIC BATHS.

Water Should Be Refiltered and Disinfected to Avoid It, Doctors Say.

The instinctive desire for cleanliness, says Lotze, marks the beginning of culture; at any rate it indicates a fortunate tendency in that direction. Dirt is unendurable in the eyes of those civilized peoples alone who prize in the case of their bodies the same degree of purity which they impart to their enterprises and their personal environment. The care of the skin through the installation of public baths is by no means a modern procedure. Ancient Rome abounded in them, and their maintenance became an important problem of the State. The baths of Diocletian accommodated hundreds. Wherever Roman civilization proceeded it was attended by a respect for personal cleanliness.

To-day the home of the ordinary citizen affords abundant opportunity to enjoy the advantage of the bath not only as a means of cleansing the body but also as a tonic and the promoter of a healthy skin—"the best undergarment ever invented." For the less opulent the institution of public baths is coming to be looked on almost as a necessity rather than a luxury. Indeed, with many the bath is included with the other recognized factors for maintaining perfect health and vigor, namely, an abundance of food, fresh air, and muscular work or bodily exercise.

It may seem like an incongruity to speak of the hygienic dangers lurking in the public bath. The growing popularity of swimming pools has led to an increased interest in their sanitary condition. There is no longer any doubt that they can actually transmit disease. When, therefore, the use of swimming pools is made compulsory, as it is in the case of pupils of secondary schools in some parts of the country, a serious duty of sanitary supervision and responsibility arises.

Typhoid fever has been traced to swimming pools in colleges and universities, secondary and elementary schools, gymnasiums, clubs, steamships, and special bathing establishments. The examination of the water is as logical a method of control as it is in the case of drinking water.

Public baths, pools, and plunges, wherever they are located, should be carefully supervised, according to physicians. Aside from the ideals of construction, equipment, water source and supply, and personal hygiene to be aimed at, it should be noted that refiltration is an efficient and economical method of keeping water clear during protracted use. Chemical disinfection, as with calcium hypochlorite used in suitable amounts, has been shown to be efficient for the disinfection of swimming-pool water. Its application to the water, in conjunction with refiltration, is urged by The Journal of the American Medical Association as an effective method of pool sanitation.

A POLICE STATION GARDEN.

Forty-second Precinct Has Rose Bushes and a Ball Court.

The policemen of the Forty-second Street Precinct, which occupies the Old Arrow Head Inn, in West 177th Street, near the Hudson River, have taken advantage of the mild weather and have laid out a large flower garden in the rear of the station house. They have planted rose bushes in the garden and are planning to lay out flower beds. They have inclosed the garden with a neat wire fence.

The men have also built a $400 handball court opposite the precinct stable. The money for the court was contributed by the men of the precinct. Commissioner Woods furnished the labor. The court is one of the best of the kind in the city. It has a cement floor two feet deep, and the walls are made of selected pine.

Have you seen the Equitable Building yet?

The Equitable Building is one of the wonders of the modern world—a sort of Grand Canyon in the granite fastnesses of Manhattan.

If it had been built for show purposes, as a part of the San Francisco Exposition, for example, the world would flock to it in wonderment and awe.

Yet how infinitely more wonderful it is that this greatest of all buildings is built for use, not for show, and that its purpose will remain long after the novelty of its greatness has worn off.

See it—and see it now!

Building now open for tenants

CARMANS STAY IN FREEPORT

Have No Intention of Leaving Home Town, Says the Doctor.

FREEPORT, L. I., May 9.—"We have no plans for the future, except that we intend to remain right here in Freeport among our friends," said Dr. Carman this evening when asked if he and Mrs. Carman intended to leave here and live elsewhere. The doctor explained that Mrs. Carman was ill with a headache this evening and would not see the newspaper men.

All day long the Carman home on the Merrick Road has been besieged by friends and neighbors who called to offer congratulations to the woman who was yesterday acquitted of the murder of Mrs. Lulu Bailey. There was also an almost constant ringing of the telephone at the Carman home, a number of out-of-town friends wanting to add their congratulations to the others.

Many pieces of flowers were also left at the house during the day, some of these with cards attached, and others from anonymous donors.

Mrs. Carman and her husband, wishing to avoid excitement, early in the day took an automobile trip to the home of an aunt of Mrs. Carman in Brooklyn, remaining there until late in the afternoon.

SUMMIT SILK STRIKE OVER.

Old Employes Will Work During Day and New Ones at Night.

Special to The New York Times.

SUMMIT, N. J., May 9.—The strike of the employes of the Summit Silk Mill was settled today at a meeting of the Citizens' Committee, President Paul Geril of the silk company, three other representatives of the company, and Sheriff George C. Otto.

It was decided to close the mill tomorrow and reopen it on Tuesday, when the strikers will take their former places and the strikebreakers will be put on a night shift. The strikebreakers number about 150 and have been employed since the walkout of the weavers, about six weeks ago.

The strike was caused by the hiring of weavers who were objected to as disturbers. When the company officials refused to discharge the "disturbers" four hundred weavers walked out.

Considerable disorder followed the employment of strikebreakers and the company spent thousands of dollars for Deputy Sheriffs who have been on guard day and night for more than a month.

A jeweled collar was also buried with the monkey and the grave was decked with carnations and roses.

The mother of Mr. Humphreys, who was a widow, married T. St. John Gaffney, who represented this country in Dresden, Germany, for several years.

REPORT ON CITY'S FINANCES

Research Bureau Points to Need of More Adequate Statements.

The Bureau of Municipal Research, which for months has been making a study of the financial conditions of the city Government, made public yesterday a report in which it endeavored to work out the effect which would be produced by adopting one or another of several theories of financing the upkeep and acquisition of property and the handling of the city debt during the next five years. The bureau, for the purposes of this report, assumed that the expenses would remain at the present level, except the State direct taxes.

"The need of a financial program," the report states, "was brought to public attention last September, when it became necessary for the city to borrow $100,000,000 in a very unfavorable market and at a high cost in interest and exchange. Since that time there has been increasing public interest on the subject of city finances, and an increasing demand for a statement by the Board of Estimate and Apportionment of what they propose to do."

The report holds that "using the term budget to mean a financial plan or program which will get before officers and citizens at one time a complete picture of future financial requirements and how they are to be met, the city has never had a budget.

"And even in making its calculations for improvements," the report continues, "no attempt has been made to get at average requirements for upkeep of property, whether for repairs or for replacements. As a matter of planning the board has attempted, but has never succeeded in its efforts to make a forecast on new improvements needed to meet the growing demands of the city."

PLAN OUTINGS FOR GIRLS.

Protective League Will Give Concert to Raise Fund.

A plan to give fresh-air outings this Summer to the more needy members of the Girls' Protective League has received the support of Miss Dorothy Perkins, Miss Mabel Choate, Mrs. James A. Burden, Jr., Mrs. John Hays Hammond, Mrs. Willard D. Straight, and a dozen other women active in the movement to help deserving young women. The league, formed under the direction of the New York Probation and Protective Association, of which Justice Page is President, has obtained a promise that Miss Geraldine Farrar, Francis Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Isadore Luckstone will take part in a concert at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel at 3:30 o'clock tomorrow afternoon to swell the outing fund.

Eight new branches of the league have been established since 1913, and the membership has increased from 1,127 to 1,789. The purpose of the league is to protect girls, promote moral education and improve conditions of work.

Receipts for Suffrage Ball Game.

In the account in yesterday's Times of the luncheon given by the Empire State Campaign Committee at the Astor, at which $50,000 was obtained for the suffrage campaign, the statement was made that the Press and Publicity Committee, of which Mrs. Normaan de R. Whitehouse is Chairman, had raised $6,508 from the sale of tickets to a baseball game which is to be held at the Polo Grounds on May 18. This figure represented not the receipts from the baseball game, but the entire sum at the disposal of the committee, and included $2,844 of contributions. The sum of $3,659 has been received from the sale of tickets to the game, but the expenses incidental to the game have to be met out of this fund

POLICE SWOOP DOWN ON PARK LITTERERS

Plain Clothes Men Summon Hundreds for Throwing Rubbish on Lawns.

THIRTY ARRESTED IN BRONX

Magistrate McAdoo Fines Them $2 Each—One Sent to Workhouse for Two Days.

The clean park crusade of the Park and Police Departments began in earnest yesterday. Several hundred persons were summoned to appear in court today for throwing rubbish on the lawns, a number were arrested, taken before Magistrates and fined one or two dollars, and one man was sent to the Workhouse for two days in default of a $2 fine.

The balmy weather enticed great throngs to all the parks and the popcorn and candy venders began enjoying a time of prosperity early in the day. Some of those who did not have permits paid fines before night. Families from congested districts mobilized with their friends on lawns of freshly cut green grass in the morning and commenced to unpack lunch baskets and boxes for their day's enjoyment. Soon little circles of greasy paper and discarded boxes began to grow about the groups and the appearance of the walks was altered by empty candy boxes and other rubbish. The numerous rubbish cans placed about in convenient places attracted no shade attention and rubbish as usual.

Certain persons wearing ordinary citizens' clothes and strolling about apparently aimlessly suddenly exhibited police badges and either arrested the offenders [illegible] or summoned them to court.

Thirty prisoners were arraigned before Chief Magistrate McAdoo in the West Farms Police Court during the afternoon. Beside him on the bench sat Dr. William T. Hornaday, Director of the Bronx Zoo, who has taken a leading part in the crusade for clean parks. During the afternoon the Chief Magistrate inflicted thirty fines, $2 being the standard sum for throwing rubbish on the lawns, and $1 for peddling without a license. Abraham Zuckerman, a clerk of 109 Henry Street, who was fined $2 for throwing a piece of popcorn wrapper on the grass, was locked up in a cell at the court, as he had only $1 with him.

"I want to say," the Magistrate observed, "that these marks cost the city a great deal of money. A great number of persons go to the parks for pleasure and recreation, but a small percentage take no care for the comfort and rights of others. They walk along in a way that suits only themselves. Now the parks are literally swamped with notices requiring people to throw their rubbish in boxes specially provided for that purpose; but some people are so dirty and slovenly that they will throw it even beside the boxes, on the walks and the grass. I have seen many occasions when the walks and lawn have been littered with refuse and the boxes empty. If I remain here these fines will be increased."

Besides the uniformed police and plain clothes men, the Magistrates of the ordinance in Bronx Park were under the surveillance of detectives from a private agency hired by persons interested in the care of the park.

Among the other prisoners before the Chief Magistrate were B. Kaufman of 160 Bathgate Avenue, the Bronx, who was held in $300 bail for examination on the charge of shooting craps in Crotona Park; four men held in the same sum for playing baseball in Mosholu Parkway, and Moses C. Cronheimer, a Philadelphia merchant, who was arrested in Pelham Bay Park while picking dogwood blossoms for a party of women in his automobile. He protested that he thought he was outside the city limits, but he was fined $2.

William Neufer, a Pole from Wallingford, Conn., was arrested for leaving on a Bronx Park lawn a piece of newspaper on which he had been sitting. He said he had not seen the signs, and when the policeman who arrested him testified that the signs in that section were in five languages—English, German, Italian, and Yiddish, but none in Polish, he was let off with a fine of only $1.

Magistrate Leach in the West Side Court fined several offenders for walking on and littering the grass in City Hall Park and Battery Park. Henry Hoffman, 65 years old, of 72 Bowery, who was fined $2 for throwing paper about in Battery Park, went to the workhouse on a two-day sentence when it was found that he could not pay his fine.

One of the heaviest fines inflicted during the day was assessed by Magistrate Sims in Night Court against Anthony Smith of 13 Madison Street, who was penalized $50 for smashing a bottle against a rock in the Botanical Gardens in Bronx Park.

INVESTIGATING THE FLEA.

Scientist Finds That It Can Carry the Bacillus of Plague 47 Days.

In view of the important part played by fleas in the spread of bubonic plague, it has become desirable to ascertain details regarding the conditions under which the infecting insects can survive and retain their capacity to transmit the disease. It has been found that infected fleas which were fed regularly might live for fifty days at a temperature of from 10 to 15 Centigrade (50 to 60 Fahrenheit) and twenty-three days at 27 Centigrade (80.6 Fahrenheit) and remain infected at death.

The Commission for the Investigation of the Plague in India noted that infection conveyed by fleas might take place three weeks after the flea population had had any opportunity of imbibing infected blood. The entomologist of the Lister Institute in London, Dr. A. W. Bacot, has lately observed that fleas are able to carry the bacillus of plague for forty-seven days, and subsequently to infect a mouse. He concludes that there is no reason to suppose that the positive results here recorded from a few experimental trials represent the limit of time after which infection may still take pacel.
